CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

SIXTY-SECOND CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

MONDAY, May 13, 1912.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. GALLINGER and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 24023) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a memorial in the nature of a cablegram from the chairman of the Independent Party, of Ponce, P. R., remonstrating against the extension of American citizenship to the people of that Territory, which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Philadelphia, Pa., favoring the passage of the so-called employers' liability and workmen's compensation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the Ladies' Aid Society of the Baptist Church of Jasper; the Highland Avenue Baptist Church, of Montgomery; the Central Presbyterian Church, of Montgomery; the Highland Avenue Christian Church, of Montgomery; the Bethel Church, of Montgomery; the Young Men's Christian Association of Montgomery; the South Side Baptist Church, of Montgomery; the Clayton Street Methodist Episcopal Church of Montgomery; and the Central Christian Church, of Montgomery, all in the State of Alabama, and of the congregations of the Methodist and Christian Churches of Goodland, Kans., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating liquors, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS. I present a telegram in the nature of a memorial relative to the employers' liability and workmen's compensation bill. I ask that the telegram lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARGENTA, ARK.

Hon. JEFF DAVIS,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

At the last regular meeting of our Local Union, Brotherhood of Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders, a resolution was adopted thanking you for the fight you have waged against the most atrocious legislation, detrimental to the interest of railroad employees, viz, the compensation bill; or, in other words, the uniform price for heads and limbs. Thanking you for the past efforts and trusting that you will exhaust all efforts to prevent passage of the same, we remain,

Yours, truly,

R. T. BOSTER.
E. WORTHSMITH.

Mr. DAVIS. I present a communication from the chairman of the Montana State legislative board, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, relative to the employers' liability and workmen's compensation bill. I ask that the communication lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To all divisions Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers in Montana and all Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers' legislative boards in the United States and all delegates, grand and national convention Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers convened at Harrisburg, Pa.

DEAR SIRS AND BROTHERS: The Montana Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers State legislative board met at Helena Saturday, April 6, pursuant to the call of the chairman, for consideration of the compensation bill now pending in National Congress, known as House bill 20487 and Senate bill 5382.

After carefully going through with the different data advanced by the advance agents of this measure, the board readily perceived that this was the most dangerous and vicious piece of legislation ever offered, State or national, against the members of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. The board wired H. E. Wills, so-called representative of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers in national matters before Congress, their protests against this measure, demanding that he advise the Senators of the State of Montana in National Congress of their opposition to this measure. The board drafted resolutions containing 34 reasons against this bill. A letter from the chairman containing some 10 or 15 further reasons against the bill was sent to Mr. Wills and grand office; also a copy to all State legislative boards in the United States. Since that time two circular letters have been sent out by the chairman, which give 10 or more further reasons against this bill.

I am in receipt of a letter from the chairman of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers State legislative board of Missouri, advising that he and a few brothers from other States were called to Washington by Wills for a conference on this compensation law. I have been waiting to hear who the members from Montana and Georgia were, where opposition to this measure has been advanced, as surely a man of such broad spirit as Mr. Wills would wish to hear the opposition to the bill, you can not conceive that he would only call in those who were true disciples of his on so important a conference.

Mr. Brittingham goes on to follow out Wills's line of argument, what compensation has done in foreign countries, where they never had any liability law, and don't know what liability law would have done instead of compensation. It is not necessary for me to take up his line of argument, as our resolutions and my letters have more than answered that. With the exception of his last three paragraphs, he goes on record as indorsing the action of the grand executives.

Believing that the individual members should get behind those officers and give them their undivided support and loyalty and show our friends in the Senate, viz, Senator REED, Senator ASHURST, Senator JEFF DAVIS, Senator OVERMAN, and a few others whom he terms the force opposing them, that we are behind them. In other words, that we are a lot of cattle, following the Judases to the slaughtering pens. He says, "What would you think of a local chairman who was adjusting a grievance for his division, and a member should give the facts and try to influence others against that chairman?" I ask him, "What would you think of a chairman who was working in with the railway company to reduce your wages from 300 to 800 per cent?" That is what Wills and his grand officer are doing—working hand in hand with the railway companies to reduce your compensation from 300 to 800 per cent. He says, "It looks to me to be on the same principle of that of a soldier shooting an officer in the back who was bravely leading them in a charge or attack upon the enemy." What brave general does he mean? Those of the militia or those of the Regulars that led their soldiers against the union miners of Colorado, the striking railway men in 1904, or those brave generals that led their soldiers against the women and children in Lawrence, Mass., this last year? Does he style Wills and the other grand executive with those brave generals? If he does, I do not question him.

Another communication from H. E. Wills, where he goes on to state that the passage of this monstrosity of a bill is assured and goes on to outline its great benefit, he also goes on to give some history of the present national liability law, the effort made to attain it and to bring it to adequate protection. But he does not tell you that on January 25, 1912, by decision of the Supreme Court, that the last leak in the great dam of the national liability bill was closed, thereby making an effective bill.

What would you think of a man, after a great dam had been built, inclosing a great reservoir holding back a great volume of water to irrigate great tracts of arid lands? Would you advocate placing a fuse with dynamite under this great structure and blowing it up, telling them that the noise and fumes from this explosion would bring down moisture for the arid lands in such a manner that we would not need to direct the water in channels for irrigating? This is true of the compensation act as compared with our perfected liability bill, and I think that the compensation bill will work out in about the same comparison as the thunder from the explosion irrigating the arid lands.

He goes on to tell you that you are assured of about 20 per cent of your monthly wages if you are totally disabled; he says that the American people guarantee you this. They do; that is, the American people guarantee this to the railway companies, and after the railway companies get this from the American people they and their Federal masters, the adjuster, will dole you out what they think you should have. Section 31 of the bill gives the railway companies the right to tax this to the consumer; you are one of the consumers; the railway men in the United States form about 20 per cent of the consumers; therefore the railway men pay 20 per cent of this insurance; pay it before they get it back, as the man that buys the article is the man who pays the freight. So you see the compensation act is nothing more to you than an insurance company, and you might just as well, and it would be cheaper for you, to pay 20 per cent to any of the old-line insurance companies. Wills's one argument is that this bill will do away with litigation to recover, notwithstanding the fact that in foreign lands, where this bill is being tried out and has been in effect for years, litigation has been increasing. He goes on to tell about the liberal provisions of the bill: Fifty dollars a month to a man with both arms taken off. He might learn to preach or practice law. How many engineers' school education is sufficient that they might fit themselves to preach or practice law? After he eliminated all those cheap attorneys, as he seems determined to do, it is reasonable to suppose that that avenue would be closed. He says that if injured they get all medical aid for 14 days. Don't they get it now?

He says the provisions of the bill were worked out in conference after a wide research into the laws of foreign countries; he says that the railway companies were heard, and that the employees were heard. The employees were not heard; their misrepresentatives were heard, and he is a misrepresentative.

He speaks of the general public. What will the general public say when the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers go on record as taking the cost of the liability of their injury received away from the railway companies and taxing it against the general public?

I believe that the convention convened to-day of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers at Harrisburg, Pa., will be called upon to pass upon this revolutionary measure, and it is my opinion that they will be closely watched by statesmen and others of the public who are acquainted with this law, and that, should they go on record as indorsing such a monstrosity of a law, when the individual members of the organization realize the way they have been betrayed they will desert the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and go to the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen—desert it like rats would a leaky vessel.

Respectfully submitted.

JAMES O'RILEY,
Chairman Montana State Legislative Board,
Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

Gove before the Colorado State Senate August 19, 1910, on the question of submitting to the qualified voters of the State of Colorado an amendment to section 1 of article 5 of the constitution of the State of Colorado, providing for the initiative and referendum. I ask that the speech be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, an order therefor will be entered.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 24023. An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. BURNHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 18960, the Agricultural appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

Mr. BURNHAM. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be acted upon as they are reached in the reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that will be the order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would suggest an understanding, that notwithstanding it is being read for committee amendments the entire bill be read. This is a bill in which we feel more than ordinary interest.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read in full. That was the understanding.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BURNHAM. The whole bill will be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed to read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was under the head of "Department of Agriculture," on page 2, line 3, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two thousand five hundred" and insert "three thousand"; in line 4, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two thousand five hundred" and insert "two thousand seven hundred and fifty."

Salaries, Office of the Secretary of Agriculture: Secretary of Agriculture, $12,000; Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $5,000; solicitor, $5,000; chief clerk, $3,000, and $500 additional as custodian of buildings; private secretary to the Secretary of Agriculture, $2,500; stenographer and executive clerk to the Secretary of Agriculture, $2,250; private secretary to the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $1,600; stenographer to the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $1,400; one appointment clerk, $2,000; one chief of supply division, $2,000; one inspector, $2,750.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 14, before the word "law," to strike out "one" and insert "three"; in the same line, after the word "law," to strike out "clerk" and insert "clerks, at"; in line 15, after the word "dollars," to insert "each," so as to read:

Three law clerks, at $2,500 each.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, we would perhaps proceed more orderly if some explanation was given why these salaries are raised. Perhaps one explanation may be comprehensive enough to answer several questions. For instance, on page 2, lines 2 and 3, a salary is raised from $2,500 to $3,000, and on the same page, in line 13, a similar raise occurs. I notice that that seems to obtain. I should like to know from the chairman of the committee, the Senator in charge of the bill, whether that is a policy running through the bill.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator I will say that there are increases in salaries in the different bureaus, but will not the Senator be content that we go through the formal reading of the bill for action on the amendments as they are reached?

Mr. HEYBURN. The formal reading has been dispensed with. I have to object now or not at all. I should like to have a correct understanding with the Senator. My suggestion was not that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with. It was that the bill be read, as under such suspension, fully.

Mr. BURNHAM. I understand.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is all; so that the body of the bill outside of the amendments would be brought to our attention. I did not object to waiving the formal reading of the bill. I only asked that in reading it for amendment the entire bill should be read. Now, I suggest that where there seems to be a systematic raise in salaries some explanation should be made in the beginning, so that we might know as we run along and find these raises what rule was being applied to them.

Mr. BURNHAM. So far as I know, the raises have been according to the estimates made by the department, and the reasons given for the increase of salaries have been satisfactory to the committee. For instance, the salary of the chief clerk is raised. I understand from the department that the chief clerk has most important duties and his salary has not been commensurate with the salary of the same officer in other departments; that the salaries of other chief clerks, of the chief clerk in the Interior Department, in the Post Office Department, and in the Treasury Department are considerably greater. This amendment simply makes the salary of the chief clerk correspond to the salary of the same officer in other departments.

Besides, this man seems to be a very important official; his salary has not changed for some time; and the growing business of the department has made an increase of his salary reasonable. I understand that he has charge of all the buildings of the department, and not only of the buildings outside, but of the equipment, and he has charge of the supplies that go to certain parts of the department. According to the Secretary, he is a most important official, and the increase proposed by the committee seems to be reasonable.

Mr. HEYBURN. That was the reason given when the former raise in that salary was made. I think we will be confronted with it in every one of these department bills. We have had it before us twice—that is to say, we have been confronted with this condition twice.

Mr. BURNHAM. There was no increase in this salary in the last appropriation act. I do not know how long before that it was when an increase was made. The salary of the chief clerk in the three departments I have mentioned was increased by the last act from $3,000 to $4,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BURNHAM. This proposed increase is $500 less than the chief clerks in those departments receive.

Mr. HEYBURN. Can the Senator tell us how much increase this will make, as it is carried into the bill, in regard to the chief clerks of the various bureaus?

Mr. BURNHAM. I do not know about the other bureaus until we reach them.

Mr. HEYBURN. I went through the bill this morning, but I left the marked copy that would have enabled me more readily to refer to it at my home, not anticipating that the bill would come up, inasmuch as another notice had been given for the morning hour to-day. I am not going to make any captious objections to this bill, and I have no desire to cut the salaries below what they should be in this age of economy, but the increases seem to run pretty generally.

Mr. BURNHAM. The Senator will have in mind that this chief clerk is not the chief clerk of a bureau or a division.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know.

Mr. BURNHAM. But he is the chief clerk of the whole department, where there are some twelve or thirteen thousand persons employed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I noticed this morning with some degree of discomfort that there are something like 13,000 employees in this department. I do not know whether we have enough people left to conduct the general industries of the country or not. I have some doubt about it. However, as we reach those items I will ask the privilege of speaking of them. I do not want to have to do it again, but I desire to express my opinion at this time.

If the Senator will take the first four cases, down to nearly the bottom of page 4, he will be somewhat astonished at the uniform increases proposed over the present salaries. I have not my marked copy of the Book of Estimates here, and it would be, perhaps, at the expense of the time of the Senate for me to attempt to hunt out the items here, as I did in the preparation I made in my copy.

Mr. WARREN. I think it will relieve the Senator of doubt if I state that they are not above the estimates. I think there is only one case in the entire bill where the increase is above the estimate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Probably the estimates need the most watching in a bill of this kind. My experience here of nearly 10 years in this kind of legislation has led me to believe that it is the estimates that we want to watch. Right in connection with this bill, seven years ago we were told that one of its departments would be self-sustaining by this time. Experience has taught us that that prophecy was unfounded. You can compare it as it applies to the bill throughout and you will find that the estimates are not at all in harmony with the prophecies.

I do not want to be thought troublesome in connection with this legislation, but I am quite sure the Senator in charge will understand that, having gone right to action upon the amendments, we must be vigilant in making such objections as we have against the amendments. We have no other opportunity of dealing with them under the arrangement we have made. I invoke the patience of the Senate in considering this bill, because I think many Senators will agree with me that we will not hurry; that is, this bill will not go through speedily.

Mr. BURNHAM. If the Senator will let me explain in a few words it may save some time.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BURNHAM. Of course the committee desires the bill to have a full hearing. We have no purpose at all to rush the bill. We only want to get it through in a reasonable time.

I wish to say a word with reference to the changes which appear on the bottom of page 2, and on page 3, and perhaps halfway down page 4. Here were some 35 mechanics three years ago. They were distributed around among the different bureaus, divisions, and offices. At that time they were brought together in one central shop, a mechanical shop, and it was found that the salaries varied; that they were unequal. This bill proposes to reclassify and readjust those salaries.

The amount of increase in those 35 instances is small. The mechanics who constitute this force came to the Secretary and told him that it was impossible for them to live upon the salaries that many of them were paid. Some of them had been a long time in the service, 25 years or more, and are efficient and capable men. Those 35 men asked for a small increase in their salaries. I will read exactly what changes were made if the Senator desires.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not; it is not necessary. The Senator's statement makes it perfectly plain to me.

Mr. BURNHAM. The total increase of those 35 mechanics amounts to $4,040. The estimate given us was $6,690. The committee changed those salaries so that to-day the aggregate increase is $4,040.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it occurred to me I have the memorandum somewhere which contains a statement of the increase of those offices of about, I think, $12,000, if my memory serves me.

Mr. GALLINGER. Thirteen thousand dollars.

Mr. HEYBURN. Thirteen thousand dollars, I am told; that is for this one office, an increase of $13,000. It may be perfectly proper to make the increase of $13,000; but it should be so stated, so that there would be no question about it, and so that Senators might not be put on inquiry as to why it should be done, because this is one office out of I do not know how many hundreds.

Mr. BURNHAM. If the Senator from Idaho has any inquiry with regard to a particular officer whose salary he thinks is increased by a large amount, I shall be very glad to reply so far as I can.

Mr. HEYBURN. No. I speak of the principle rather than the numerical increase. I speak of the principle of increasing the salaries of one office the duties of which have not materially changed—not changed in fact since the last appropriation bill. We have been doing this right along, probably in response to a false cry of the high cost of living. Now, I would ask the Senator if that was taken into consideration?

Mr. BURNHAM. What?

Mr. HEYBURN. The question of the high cost of living.

Mr. BURNHAM. Oh, I presume some of the requests for increase came from parties who were affected by the high cost of living, but in explanation of the total I would like to say that two law clerks were brought from what is known as the lump-sum appropriation and made officers of the Secretary's office. The salary one of those two men received was $1,800 and the other $2,000, and that $3,800 would heretofore have come from the lump-sum appropriation. But they are men who deserve all that this bill proposes to give them, and the amount of each salary was $2,500.

Mr. HEYBURN. I presume those are the ones mentioned on page 713 of the statement of expenditures of the Department of Agriculture. It interested me to understand that. I have it marked in preparing for the consideration of this bill. William J. Mangan, law examiner, at $1,000. He was paid $400 of that salary; I presume that is for a part of the year, for less than a year's service; and for his traveling expenses, $308.45, very nearly as much as he was paid for salary. It attracted my attention. Then, right next, following him appears Stephen J. Huneston, law examiner, at $1,500, and he seems to have earned only a part of that. I find another one, Gerald Griffin, land-law clerk, on the same page, who received $1,000 for salary and $73.45 for traveling expenses.

I want, at the proper time, to question the propriety of having two sets of attorneys for one department of the Government. Of course, we furnish this department with legal service under another provision of the law, and I shall want to know at the proper time why these expenses are incurred.

Page 713 of this volume is a very interesting page; it carries the expert miners and experts of all kinds. I think Senators will find some interest in an examination of that page, but I will not anticipate that part of the bill until we come to it.

I think I understand now that the Senator from New Hampshire concedes that throughout this bill there is a uniform, if not harmonious, change in salaries to a very considerable extent.

Mr. BURNHAM. To a certain extent, I presume, as other bills have averaged. I am not aware that this bill is peculiar in that respect.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, I would suggest a parliamentary inquiry, as to whether when the Presiding Officer announces that without objection an amendment is adopted, that can not be questioned until we get into the Senate. Am I correct in that?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Of course it is understood when the Chair makes such an announcement and a Senator arises immediately after and says he objects, the objection is in ample time.

Mr. HEYBURN. But it behooves us to be vigilant to see that we are not foreclosed until the bill is in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. HEYBURN. And I ask that I may be excused if I seem a little prompt and perhaps elaborate in some of the objections that I may make.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question. I wish to ask why there is such an increase in these law clerks? There has been an increase of three in this case. They already have 23 law clerks in the department. Why has it become necessary to increase the number and to increase them in the grade to which we pay the highest salaries?

Mr. BURNHAM. The increase in this case is only one. I would say to the Senator from Alabama, in reply, that this inquiry came to the committee, and the committee was assured that all of these law clerks were absolutely necessary and that the amount of law business connected with the different services was very much larger than probably most of the committee supposed.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. The House bill carried 23 law clerks; the Senate committee has increased it to 25; and it has made these increases in the highest grade of pay.

Mr. BURNHAM. I think, in reply to the Senator, that two of those are transfers from what we call "the lump-sum appropriation" to the Secretary's office upon an increased salary; but they were already being paid substantially the same salary from the "lump-sum appropriation." They are not increased in numbers.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I only speak of what the bill shows here in regard to the appropriation.

Mr. BURNHAM. That would not appear from the bill; they simply disappear from the "lump-sum appropriation" and appear here.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Then you have increased, in line 24, the number of messengers from 9 to 12.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that on the next line he will notice a decrease to correspond to the increase on line 24.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I think that is true.

Mr. BURNHAM. In reply to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] I explained, or endeavored to explain, what the changes were and why they were made at the bottom of page 2, on page 3, and about half-way down page 4. If the Senator was present, he undoubtedly is aware of that explanation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, the inquiry of the Senator from Alabama raises a question that will have to be confronted soon. I think perhaps as the groundwork for the consideration of this bill, we might as well look at it now. That is the question of the lump-sum appropriation, and that must be coupled with the transfer system. We made certain lump-sum appropriations for certain branches of the service without authority of law, so far as I am advised. They have assumed to transfer from one fund to another to a very large extent, amounting to very large sums of money, and I am curious to know by what authority a department of the Government can, under the constitutional prohibition in regard to the making of appropriations, transfer any part of the money appropriated for a certain purpose to another purpose.

Mr. BURNHAM. The Senator must be aware of the fact that in 1910, I think, by the appropriation act the Secretary of Agriculture was expressly directed to take from the lump sum and to put upon the statutory roll all executive officers and clerks and those under the grade of clerks. The Senator must be aware of that fact.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think that that has any application to the remarks I have just made. I think in the beginning of the consideration of this measure, inasmuch as we are going to be deliberate about it—and it involves some of the most serious questions that confront us—that we might as well spend a little time in finding out the basis upon which these appropriations are made and expended and the method of administering this department.

I recognize that the Agricultural Department of the United States is one of the greatest usefulness, and it is one that reaches an element of the people of the country that is entitled to the benefits of legislation; but I maintain that it must be appropriate legislation; I maintain that it must be wise administration; and it must be within the mandate of the law; and it is to that end that I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to consider with a good bit of patience and some detail the provisions of this bill. It is one that we have differed about in times gone by.

The general principle upon which the bill is drawn should be understood as we start in upon its consideration, because we can not take each item and discuss it. There are thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands, of items in this bill. We must first divide them into classes, and then we must find upon what principle the class is based, and we will, perhaps, be governed by that in our final action; at least I trust we will.

I do not believe there is any authority vested in any officer of any administrative branch of the Government to transfer an appropriation made for the War Department to the Department of the Navy, for instance. Neither the President nor any combination of executive officers could do that. Now, on the face of their official report they tell us that they have disregarded our mandate, and when we appropriated $6,600,000 for one purpose they have transferred that to another branch of the service. It is questionable whether or not Congress would have appropriated that money had it known that it was to be used for this other purpose. That was the disguise that accompanied the former appropriation bill upon this subject. We gave a lump-sum appropriation, subject to the disposition of the Secretary of Agriculture, amounting to a very large sum of money. I will doubtless be able to turn to the express reference in a moment, as I want to call attention to the language used, although it is too late to do more than criticize it.

These lump-sum salaries are directly connected with that appropriation. We were unwise enough to undertake to delegate to the Secretary of Agriculture a duty that the Constitution places upon us, and the responsibility accompanying that duty. You can turn to page 362 of this indispensable statement of expenditures of the Department of Agriculture and you will find this statement:

Original subappropriation, $31,414.

That was decreased by transferring a part of it to other subappropriations. Some of these run up into thirty, forty, fifty, or sixty thousand dollar items. Where the money that we appropriated proved excessive, as some Senators insisted that it would be, in order to meet the fact, when they were confronted with it, they transferred to some other fund the excess that was predicted, which gave them wider scope in other fields. That is one item on that page.

Mr. BURNHAM. I notice, if the Senator will allow me, that the item he is now discussing has reference to the Forest Service. Could we not wait until we get to the Forest Service before we discuss that?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am discussing a principle. It would be just as applicable if I were to go back to some of the other items.

Mr. BURNHAM. Of course the Senator is aware that when a salary is transferred from the lump-sum appropriation to the statutory roll the lump sum is diminished by that amount, as a rule.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, I think the Senator will find that not only am I not apprised of it but that the records of the department will not bear that out.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator a question? Has the lump sum we have appropriated been used by the Secretary for the purpose of increasing the number of officers or increasing their salaries?

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will frame that question so that it would read "Did he do it?" instead of whether he had that purpose in mind, then I would answer that he did.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has it been done?

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. And by what authority?

Mr. HEYBURN. That the Senator will have to assist us in determining; and I know he can be of great assistance in determining that legal proposition.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is that lump sum appropriated every year in order to allow these officials to create new offices and increase salaries?

Mr. HEYBURN. If I could again reframe the question of the Senator, I would say yes.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, I would not care to have that go wholly unanswered, because there is no such purpose in this legislation, nor is the Secretary of Agriculture given to any such practice. There is, as I understand, and has been all along, a general expense account, and until the legislation to which I have referred, under which certain employees were taken from what is known as the lump-sum roll and placed on the statutory roll, the department was in the habit of paying or did pay such employees from that general fund. It gave a certain elasticity for promotions and for certain changes. Now, that has been entirely obviated, so far as there was any cause for objection, by legislation which compelled the Secretary to put upon the statutory roll and take from the lump-sum roll these individual officers.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, from time to time the Secretary has had certain money which was in what was called the lump-sum appropriation and appointed officers not provided for by law.

Mr. WARREN. There has been nothing of that kind. This bill has carried large lump sums for purposes which included the employment of men in the meat-inspection service, for instance, and in the Forest Service. When we find there are to be annually expended large sums for help out of a lump sum, we, by legislation, may direct the Secretary to put employees upon the statutory roll as fast as possible and report to Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. This is a reform we are going to enact now, but heretofore they have been doing that.

Mr. WARREN. They did. They expended it as we authorized them to expend it. When the Forest Service——

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not speaking only of the Forestry Department, but of other departments. I should like to ask the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, who has to deal with other appropriation bills as well, is it so that they have been using this lump sum for that purpose?

Mr. WARREN. It is not, only where they are authorized to do it, and where, as in the meat-inspection service, it was so provided. The meat-inspection service was first provided for by an amendment offered on the floor of the Senate after the committee consideration of the bill proper had been finished. There was money so placed at the disposal of the Agriculture Department to do certain things, and it was to include the employment of the employees.

Now, possibly that was bad legislation, if the Senator wishes me to pass upon it. It is always bad legislation to appropriate lump sums to employ help in any public matter, if it can be avoided. In private life it is the way to do business, of course. In public business greater publicity is sought. Therefore these appropriations should be placed in the hands of the Secretary with the designation as to all the help that it is practicable to give employment to under the classified list.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that in a great many of the departments clerks have been appointed with no authority provided by the law, by taking money from the lump sum appropriated for one purpose and appointing some clerks. I am glad the Senator says he is going to stop that kind of business.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator from North Carolina—and surely as a member of the Committee on Appropriations he will be glad to do it—will call our attention to every one of those instances, and if there is any one that needs correction I shall be glad to aid therein.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator admits that it has been done heretofore.

Mr. WARREN. No; I admit there have been large amounts expended for temporary help in emergency appropriations provided for such purposes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think we ought to give them that authority beyond the amount absolutely necessary.

Mr. HEYBURN. I must claim the floor or I am liable to be misunderstood. My complaint was not against the department primarily, but against Congress. The Senator from Wyoming has suggested the situation. In the last hour of madness we made a round sum appropriation. In other words, we threw a million dollars up into the air and said to the Secretary, "Catch it and do what you please with it; only classify it," as stated by the Senator from New Hampshire.

That is the situation. The amendment was introduced at the last session by the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON], or four years ago. But it was represented by some friends, and it was done in exuberant defiance of the objections of those who were trying to consider the best interests of the country. It was done because they found they could do it. I never saw such a reckless piece of legislation indulged in. No one pretended to know what was going to be done with it. No one dared to stand on the floor and say it was necessary for anything. But they seized the reins and were driving along, and some one said, "Let us give them another million," and the amendment was carried.

I object to that. The fruit of it is in that which I have criticized. We authorize the Secretary to expend this money, only requiring that it be accounted for, and that is true, as suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, and it is accounted for, and the amount is such an outrageous commentary upon careful legislation that I am impelled to address some remarks to it on this occasion. So I think we now understand the situation from which I speak.

We find on pages 26 and 27 two pages of messenger boys, which was the result of the creation of this fund of luxury. The messenger boys are not in the Forestry Service, but in the Weather Bureau. As my eye estimates these lines, about 140 messenger boys are in that service.

Mr. BURNHAM. Now, this is with reference to the Weather Bureau, and the messengers are employees of the Weather Bureau, and are scattered all over this country, and that accounts for the number. Does the Senator complain that these are specialized here, or designated here? I understand that two years ago that policy, wrong or right, no matter, was abandoned and all these individual parties were placed on the record so that the Senator or anybody else could see them.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have just said——

Mr. BURNHAM. Does the Senator complain of that or of the policy that has been abandoned?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not complaining at all. I am pointing out the facts. These items never appeared before.

Mr. BURNHAM. Does the Senator complain that they appear now?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not complaining at all. I am discussing this bill. I am not here as one who is complaining of some one, either the committee or the Department of Agriculture. If I were to enter a complaint at all it would be against providing so expensive a plaything for a bureau or department of the Government. I will not do that at all. I will not complain at all.

I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that there will be no haste in passing over these amendments. I do not care if it takes to the 1st day of June to do it.

Mr. BURNHAM. I am perfectly willing to stay here as long as is the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not a challenge, either.

Mr. BURNHAM. I am not in any haste, and I hope the Senator will not use that as a menace.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have expressed no menace. I have expressed a candid statement of intentions to consider this bill without any regard to the urgency or the necessity of hurrying it through. I imagine it will take some time to dispose of this bill. It certainly will not be completed to-day. Now, let us keep cool-headed about it and see if we can get some wisdom from its consideration.

I now have my attention, at least at this time, addressed to the Weather Bureau, and I was commenting upon the disclosure that was incident to the action of Congress at its last session. At that time I took the liberty of expressing the same views that I am now expressing. It is not necessary to repeat errors of former bodies at all. If the last session of Congress erred, I am going to try to see that this Congress does not err without at least having knowledge of the fact that it is erring. That is the position I occupy, and therefore I shall ask the privilege of considering this measure with a great deal of careful, patient attention.

I just call attention to these pages because they discover a condition that if known when the appropriations was made would probably have defeated the appropriation. This is the first time we have a statement possessed of sufficient candor to enable us to address intelligent criticism to it.

I will undertake to say that if the statement we are now presented with had been before Congress at the last time when it was dealing with these questions, those reckless appropriations would not have been made. Senators were first put upon inquiry at that time, and we enjoined upon the department the duty of making plain that which we now have before us. Having it here, it would be a waste of time to require the department to make this candid statement if we did not consider it after it was made.

There was some opposition to the proposition that the department should make such a statement, but the wisdom of Congress determined that we should have full information, and we have. It is at our immediate control. Taking this in connection with the Book of Estimates we have the whole story of the administration of this department.

There is no department in the Government for which I have a higher appreciation than the Agricultural Department. It is very far-reaching.

Now, I shall pass those pages, only calling attention to what has been paid to the assistant observers. We did not know we had these assistant observers to any such extent as they appear on pages 21, 22, and 23. We are paying out probably forty-odd thousand dollars a year for assistant observers, paying them a thousand dollars a year each. Where they are observing and whether or not their observations are material is a question I will not pause to analyze, but Congress will take notice of the fact that it is an unusual item and one for which it appropriated in the last appropriation bill without any knowledge as to the number or the salaries involved.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator from Idaho yield for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to know whether the Secretary of the Treasury estimated for the two law clerks who have been added—$2,500 each.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not anticipate that the bill would be up so early, but I guess I can find it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Book of Estimates says:

> Two law clerks, at $2,500 each (increase of one submitted), $5,000.

I should like to know whether that is an increase of one over last year or whether it is an increase of two. In carrying out the total for the law clerks of the first class, the total is carried out at $5,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will not pause to investigate further. If the Senator has the Book of Estimates, page 132 and following, I think he will get that information.

Mr. BURNHAM. If the Senator cares to have any statement in regard to it I will say just a word. Two law clerks at $2,500 each, were added to the one law clerk that was in the bill, making three law clerks; and we have from the department a statement with reference to the two law clerks who are referred to in this bill, and one of them, a Mr. Cronin, under the supervision of the Solicitor, is employed in the enforcement of the law connected with foods and drugs. That man was in the service at the time and was put upon the statutory roll of the Secretary at this salary.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. What attracted my attention to it was the Book of Estimates, page 111—the Book of Estimates prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury with reference to the Agricultural Department. It submits estimates for two law clerks, at $2,500 each, $5,000. I ask if the chairman has a supplemental estimate covering the other law clerk?

Mr. HEYBURN. I——

Mr. BURNHAM. Let me answer the Senator from Wyoming, please.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BURNHAM. The Secretary did communicate with the committee, saying that he desired the three law clerks, two law clerks additional to the one.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But they were not estimated for.

Mr. BURNHAM. Two were estimated for and the third provided, because of the letter of the Secretary.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is what I wanted to ask—whether they were estimated for.

Mr. BURNHAM. The Secretary set forth satisfactory reasons for their employment.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask the Senator, before he takes his seat, how many law clerks are provided for now?

Mr. BURNHAM. I think the Senator from Idaho stated the number.

Mr. HEYBURN. We find 24 law clerks on the first page of his statement, and then under the subdivisions you will find in various ones further provisions; but you will find 24 law clerks on the first page of the statement. That will give you a little more definite information.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That would be 25 in the bill and 24 in the estimate.

Mr. HEYBURN. This bill is a good bit of a maze. There are some things you can find in the bill, and I say it without any animadversion upon anyone, and there are other things which you will not find in the bill at present.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask another question? Is there any showing or statement in print showing the necessity of this number of law clerks, and so forth? Was there a showing before the committee or anything of that kind that some one who is not a member of the committee may have to read?

Mr. BURNHAM. I know this, that an inquiry came to me personally why so many law clerks were provided for, and the Secretary or his assistant said there was necessity for every one, and that they had regular and constant work. It covered the whole list and the whole department.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask, Does the Senator know how many law clerks this department has now, compared with the number of law clerks the Interior Department has?

Mr. BURNHAM. I am not possessed of that information. I understand the Forestry Service requires a large number of law clerks.

Mr. BORAH. I should think so.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should be glad to know why.

Mr. BURNHAM. To attend to the business of that service in a great many ways.

Mr. HEYBURN. The forest reservations are not supposed to be open within their exterior boundaries where anybody lives except the foresters. Do they get into controversies?

Mr. BURNHAM. Yes; some controversies. The Senator is aware of the fact that sales of timber are made and surveys are made.

Mr. HEYBURN. Does that require law clerks?

Mr. BURNHAM. The department needs law clerks to make up bonds and licenses.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have examined those papers, and I know of no instance or I recall none where any lawyer had made them out. They were made by the joint effort of the attorney for the party who was getting the license to graze upon the land and the forestry officer, upon blanks.

Mr. BURNHAM. I can not go into detail in reference to the employment of every law clerk, but I can see where their services are required.

Mr. WARREN. They are required not only for the Forest Service, but with respect to the food and drugs act. That takes a large portion of the time of some of these law clerks.

Mr. BORAH. I did not understand that.

Mr. HEYBURN. What do they have to do in connection with that act?

Mr. WARREN. Everything. They have to do with the preparation of cases in order to enforce the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; they do not. What does the law clerk have to do with the enforcement of the pure-food act? The United States district attorney is the man who enforces the law.

Mr. WARREN. He does not attend to the details.

Mr. HEYBURN. The department has nothing to do with it except to submit the case to the United States district attorney.

Mr. WARREN. The department has all to do with it until it reaches a point where it is submitted to the Attorney General. It has to be done not only in Washington, but at every other point where the operatives of the department are employed.

Mr. HEYBURN. There has been a fictitious government built up within this department that has recently caused something of a scandal, where they have undertaken to usurp the powers of the United States attorney and the United States courts. On the floor of the Senate when that bill was before the body for consideraion that question was thrashed out. The bill came over from the House with a provision for a Bureau of Standards, with the equipment of clerks and bureau assistants, including attorneys. The Senate disagreed to that and put the whole matter under the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States. Those cases then can be prosecuted only in United States courts and by United States officers, none of which come within or are put in the provisions of the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. BURNHAM. It must be very apparent to the Senator from Idaho that when complaints are brought to the office there must be an examination of the complaints, and the preparation of those cases is not done by the Department of Justice. I understand these law clerks have a great deal to do with the preparation of those cases before they are submitted to the Attorney General.

Mr. HEYBURN. They have too much to do with them, as we found in a recent investigation there.

Mr. BURNHAM. They must have had some business to do, then.

Mr. HEYBURN. If there is an appropriation to be made to pay for legal services in the prosecution of those cases, it must come under a different appropriation bill. When we make appropriations for the maintenance of the courts and judges and United States attorneys we may then provide for any necessary assistants.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the last appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture a provision was inserted that hereafter the law clerks should be detailed by the Secretary of Agriculture for service in and out of Washington. That does not appear in the present bill, because it was made permanent in the bill of last year. So I apprehend—and I know very little about it—that the Department of Agriculture, if complaint is made in New Hampshire, for instance, may detail one of its law clerks to go there and investigate the matter previous to submitting it to the proper legal authority. I do not know whether that is so, but I judge it is from the phraseology of the bill of last year.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, while the Agricultural Department, through its officers, may search out a complaint of an infraction of law, they are not the only ones who may do it. One may not violate that law merely because the Agricultural Department has not discovered him in the act of doing so. That provision, of course, was as reckless as anything could be, unguarded as it is, that you might send assistant attorneys or representatives from one department of the Government anywhere to interfere with the business of another department of the Government. I am not here to disturb it, and no good would come from attacking it at this time. I just notice it in passing as a part of the scenery of this legislation.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, there is not a department of the Government, so far as I know, but that has its law officers and clerks; and it has been thought to be more convenient to do the work that way than to have the law business of the country all done through the Attorney General.

We have various things, not only at Washington but all over the country, that the Department of Agriculture has to attend to through men of legal education. For instance, there is the 36-hour law, or the 28-hour law, regarding the transportation of live animals on railroads, which is often violated in the shipment of live stock at various points. The food and drugs act may be violated at any point in the United States. It is idle to talk about all that business going to the Attorney General. What does that department know about the transgressions of either the pure-food law or the meat-inspection law or the transgressions of railroads until such matters are carried up to it by those in charge? Those cases are handled by the Department of Agriculture, so far as they can be, and it is only when some great question arises that it goes to the Attorney General. It comes up from the Agricultural Department, necessarily, just the same as cases come from the other departments. If the Secretary of Agriculture has to do without law clerks there is no reason why every other department of the Government should not do without them.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, our system of government is based upon the principle that the Department of Justice will furnish every other department with any legal advice or assistance that it needs. I say to the Senator who dissents from me on that I believe I am absolutely correct in my statement. The Department of Justice was inaugurated for the very purpose of providing legal advice and assistance.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator proposes to lay down the proposition that there is a constitutional division among the departments. They are the mere creatures of statutes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not lay down such a proposition.

Mr. LODGE. I understood the Senator to say we had no right to employ these law clerks in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not say we could or could not. I say that we have furnished a legal department of the Government that is armed, equipped, and provided for this service, and we will not have a Department of Justice in each of the other departments.

Mr. LODGE. It stands to reason that no Attorney General's office can possibly follow up the infractions of every law which other departments have to enforce. They have to be reported to the Department of Justice from the Post Office Department, from the Interior Department, and from all the different departments of the Government. It is utterly impossible that the Attorney General should follow up the enforcement of every law on the statute books.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think the Senator will think more and think better of that. We can just as well in this legislation give 14 law clerks to the Department of Justice as we can give them to the Department of Agriculture, and it will effectuate the same purpose.

Mr. President, I will not deal any longer with those law clerks, but I want to call attention to this question of lump-fund salaries. I will keep away from the Forest Service until that is reached, about the middle of the week. I find here the Weather Bureau, under the head of lump-fund salaries, the same objectionable principles. I find lump-sum salaries extending from page 53 to 76. I find the sums appropriated last year are paid out of this lump fund that was given. There was no specific appropriation for it. I need not recall to the minds of Senators the constitutional limitation upon making appropriations. They can only be made for a specific purpose. Appropriations made for one purpose can not be used for another.

Then again, Mr. President, an appropriation can only be made upon the estimates and for a definite purpose specified in the appropriation. Have we forgotten the Constitution of the United States? It seems for a few years that we have. We appropriate money here under the rule of thumb rather than under the provisions of the Constitution. Those are things I object to on principle.

Now, I will get the total. One hundred and eight thousand dollars was the aggregate sum of appropriations under the fund to which I have called attention. It is stated at the head of the page, $108,000 out of the lump sum, for purposes of which Congress had no knowledge. We did not know that we were making the appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BURNHAM. I wish to say, from information I have, that the expenditures of the Department of Agriculture have been for some time in the precise form they are now, and the names of the individuals and the salaries are carried out under that lump sum.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is doubtless true. I am hoping and praying for a return to appropriations to be made pursuant to the Constitution of the United States, and I am speaking on behalf of that cause.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator in just what form he thinks we could make our appropriations covering all these various items? We have the information as to how this money was expended and the name of each individual and the amount he received for salary and expenses. They run up into the hundreds. Some of the money has been turned back, I notice, in one or two cases. I am glad to observe that. I should like to ask the Senator just how he thinks we could frame an appropriation bill providing for the expenditure of $1,000,000, for instance, under the Bureau of Animal Industry?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will turn to the Bureau of Animal Industry. I had the Weather Bureau before me. If I thought the Constitution of the United States was unenforceable or inapplicable, I would not be so enthusiastic an admirer of it as I am.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will find the Bureau of Animal Industry at page 124 of the statement of expenditures of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have it.

Mr. GALLINGER. It commences at page 123.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is an appropriation of $3,000,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. A little over $1,000,000, I think.

Mr. HEYBURN. It says, on page 124, for 1911, $3,000,000, at the head of the page. The trouble here is that we got the items after the bill was passed instead of before. We appropriate for a purpose, and we must have that purpose before our minds. We must know the purpose. Here we make the appropriation and find the purpose afterwards. That is the difficulty. You should just reverse that system and not be appalled at the inquiry as to how you do it. We should have had this statement of the amount necessary to be appropriated before we appropriate it. We appropriate that in a lump sum, and the Senator will find it so stated on pages 125 and 124.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; and, Mr. President, I find, too, that the Secretary of Agriculture has expended that appropriation, accounting for every item of appropriation, and the statement shows that he turned back into the Treasury $159,718.43. So we have explicit information as to how every item of it was expended.

Now, this may not be good legislation. It may be that we are spending too much money on the Bureau of Animal Industry, for instance; but it seems to me that the only way we can get at that is to make an investigation and ascertain whether or not the Secretary of Agriculture is profligate, whether he is doing unwarrantable things or not.

However, I still fail to understand how the Senator is going in an appropriation bill to provide for each one of these items of expenditure. I think we have to give the Secretary of Agriculture a certain amount of money, as we always have done, and then hold him to strict accountability for its expenditure, which we have done. He has responded by sending the name of every employee and the amount of money received both for salaries and expenses; and I do not for the life of me see how we can put the matter in any different shape.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the Senator's suggestion rather illustrates the recklessness of the appropriation. The Secretary of Agriculture does not seem to have known how much he would need nor does Congress seem to have had any idea of the amount he would need.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are to receive through him $3,000,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course I would not for a moment suggest that he misappropriated any of it or that it was misspent, or make any such suggestion.

Mr. WARREN. Three million dollars is the annual appropriation made by Congress.

Mr. HEYBURN. But he did not need it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator how could the Secretary of Agriculture have known in advance how much he needed? He could not anticipate what circumstances were to arise in the investigation of infractions of the law all over this great country. Naturally he had to make an estimate as to what he would require. Last year he estimated a little too high, and we gave him a little more money than he needed. The balance of it is turned back into the Treasury. Whether he employed men he ought not to have employed is a matter that I do not undertake to pass upon.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator what $3,000,000 appropriation he refers to?

Mr. HEYBURN. I refer to the item on page 124 of the statement.

Mr. WARREN. The appropriation of $3,000,000 to the Department of Agriculture for meat inspection? That is an annual appropriation.

Mr. HEYBURN. But it is not meat inspection. I refer to the animal-industry inspection.

Mr. WARREN. That is, of course, inspection—the prevention of disease, and so forth, most naturally. The $3,000,000 meat-inspection item is there by legislation that was passed here years ago.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am not speaking recklessly, because I have been wasting some hours that I might have expended more comfortably in sleep in going over this thing; and I am not speaking merely for the pleasure of speaking. Commencing on page 124 we have the list of items; there are about 60 to the page.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator kindly read the caption?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Report of expenditures for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911, under appropriation "Meat inspection, Bureau of Animal Industry, 1911," $3,000,000.

Of course, I am coming to meat inspection. I was not unadvised of that fact. It follows. Here are veterinary inspectors of various classes. There are about 400 of that class of employees, and their salaries run all the way up to $1,400 and $1,500. I do not know what the average would be. The amount paid in mileage is a very large item. For instance, Alford D. Bullock, page 126, received $1,800 salary and $1,760.53 traveling expenses.

Mr. GALLINGER. A great many of them received only three or four dollars for traveling expenses.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but I am giving the facts. I am not talking sentiment at all. On page 125, another inspector, A. J. Pistor, received $2,250 salary, and he received $1,617.32 for traveling expenses. Another man, on page 124, Edward P. Schaffter, received $2,499.99 for salary, and he received $1,638.43 for traveling expenses; that is, for travel and station and field expenses.

Mr. WARREN. There is nothing unusual about that. We provide in the original law, which appropriates annually $3,000,000, that at every point where meat is manufactured for interstate use and sale there shall be one or more inspectors as the occasion may require. Now, those inspectors are scattered over the country to a considerable extent. We must also protect lives by inspecting outgoing and incoming meats and meat animals. We must have inspectors to visit these various places. The fact that the traveling expenses are large compared to salaries is rather to the credit of the management and the men, because a man with a not large salary, it seems, gets over a good deal of country in executing the duties of his office. That does not apply to all, but to quite a number.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator dropped inadvertently into an error. I am not complaining of traveling expenses in meat inspection because those are small items and amount to practically nothing. I was speaking entirely of veterinary inspectors. Of the meat inspectors, the Senator will see, if he will turn to the pages, nine-tenths or three-fourths draw nothing for expenses. Those are items like $32 and $20.

Mr. WARREN. Those inspectors are regularly located at some point. Veterinarians are inspectors in a sense, and veterinarians travel from point to point. They are to watch the meats we import and export, also to see that no foot-and-mouth or other disease may come in with live animals.

Mr. HEYBURN. Horses do not have foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. WARREN. Cattle do.

Mr. HEYBURN. Cattle do not enter——

Mr. WARREN. Horses have glanders. Of course, the Senator knows that it is useless to discuss with me what are the diseases of horses and cattle and sheep. He knows as well as I do that they are all subject to certain diseases.

These inspectors, these veterinarians, if it is a case of glanders in horses, are to take possession of the animals and destroy them. If it is a case of foot-and-mouth disease, they have to do the same; and they have to apply the quarantine laws.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have had occasion to give some attention to the character of diseases that attack certain animals, and I know the Senator from Wyoming is thoroughly conversant with the facts.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wyoming will permit me, the Senator from Idaho has called attention to three or four cases where the agent received a large amount, or an apparently large amount, for traveling expenses, but if the Senator will go through the entire list he will find that it does not average $100. I will call his attention, for instance, on page 125, to Mr. S. W. Burt, who drew $1.80 for travel, station, and field expenses; to Mr. Boyd Baldwin, who received $1.50; and so on; and there are a great many instances in the long list given here where they did not draw a dollar. It is hardly fair for the Senator from Idaho to give the impression that these enormous amounts, or apparently enormous amounts, are be[illegible]id for traveling expenses. Here are two whole pages [illegible]re are not more than 20 out of a couple of hundred [illegible]ything. It may be that those two or three to wh[illegible] Senator alludes were paid an excessive amount for t[illegible] expenses, but I apprehend that they had to give a det[illegible]count of how they spent the money, and that the Secretary of Agriculture only allowed it to be paid on vouchers.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I did not enter upon the criticism in detail of these items. I referred to them necessarily in considering the principle of legislation. I say that had those items been before Congress when it enacted the last appropriation bill for the expenses of this department, it would not have appropriated that sum of money. I am calling for a reform in the manner of appropriating money for these departments, and I merely mention incidentally these items, or point them out, as instances of what would, perhaps, have stayed the hand of legislation and brought it down to a proper basis.

Mr. GALLINGER. I venture to ask the Senator from Idaho how we could have had those items? The Secretary of Agriculture is a very wise man, but he is not a prophet; he could not have foreseen the necessity for the employment of these men a year ahead. We are in this bill providing for the next year after the end of this fiscal year. The Senator from Idaho does not know whether there is going to be an epidemic among cattle or horses in this country; he does not know whether there is to be expenditures called for all along the line which we can not anticipate. So I repeat my suggestion to the Senator that if there is to be any method he can suggest whereby we can make these appropriations, as he contends, constitutionally, I should like to know what that method is.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I can state it very briefly and concisely.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am sure the Committee on Appropriations, of which I chance to be a member, would be very happy to have the Senator elaborate his scheme and explain precisely how it can be done, because, if it can be done, if we can know in advance how much money the Secretary of Agriculture is going to need to extirpate diseases of cattle or of horses that may occur all over the country, I should like to have him do it; but I can not conceive how that can be ascertained.

Mr. HEYBURN. We do it in other appropriations.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no; we do not do anything that can be compared to this.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; and then I will reply to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. WARREN. I am going to follow the same line as that suggested by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. President, I am very glad to have the Senator from Idaho bring up the subject of applying appropriations as directly and with as much accountability as possible. I hope he will give us some advice that we may profit by, but in the particular case of the meat-inspection law, which provides a continuing annual appropriation of $3,000,000, I was not in the Senate Chamber on the day, some years ago, when it was put on as a rider to the agricultural appropriation bill. I was called out of town before the matter came in, and the law was passed making an annual $3,000,000 appropriation. I am free to say that I think that the law has been of great value. It is one of those undertakings on the part of the Government that, while some portion of the expense may be foreseen and provided for beforehand, as to who shall be employed, and at what salaries, a very large part of it comes in the expenditure for emergencies and from different calls in various parts of the country, and necessarily is temporary or per diem work.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would like to ask the Senator from Wyoming if he is referring to the meat-inspection or to the veterinary service?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I shall explain.

I have fought against additions to the appropriation of $3,000,000 and the purposes for which they are proposed, where the intention is to carry the appropriation so far as to include all foods, drugs, and other things; but I do not know any better way than, under the legislation which provides every year $3,000,000, to hold the Secretary of Agriculture responsible through his report here, and, as you might say, audit it in Congress. If there is any better way, I add my request to that of the Senator from New Hampshire that the Senator from Idaho shall state it.

Mr. GALLINGER. We require the Secretary to make his report.

Mr. WARREN. Every officer of the Government who has to deal with contingencies or emergencies must necessarily have some leeway. For instance, in the meat-inspection service and in the general purposes of the Animal Industry Bureau there have to be employed per diem employees for perhaps a day or three or four days or a month. We do not want to carry the salaries throughout the year for men enough to meet every contingency. There must be some place where, in case of a great conflagration, we can have extra men and pay them; or where, if an epidemic should break out and there should be any requirement necessary for the protection of the life or health of the animals of this country, men would have to be employed immediately on the best possible terms, the account then to be rendered to Congress and audited by Congress.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with the Senator from Wyoming in regard to the meat-inspection provision. No one could be more strongly in sympathy with that than am I. I was directing my remarks to the animal-industry schedule, if it may be so termed.

Mr. WARREN. Well, in a measure, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, the Bureau of Animal Industry has more in the way of contingencies than the other bureaus, because it takes care of the inspection of live animals which may be imported or exported and domestic animals which are running in all parts of the United States. An epidemic may break out here or a contagion there, and it must be stamped out before it is allowed to spread over the entire country. Therefore experts have to be employed; otherwise we would have a great body of men who for a portion of the year would be unemployed, and there would be no necessity for their payment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I appreciate that, but the Secretary of Agriculture on a former occasion had the equivalent of the facts which he now presents to us.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has inquired as to my suggestion in dealing with this legislation. In other appropriation bills we say "for such and such a service, nine clerks, three assistants," and so on. The provision in this bill should specify the number of employees who might be engaged in this work. We so provide in other appropriation bills, which are similar to this one. We could say here, for instance, "For 360 veterinary inspectors, at so much, so many dollars." We would then know how many men we were going to have as a maximum and what the cost would be; but, mind you, this was done under a lump-sum appropriation, and we were never more fortunate in having an example that could not be criticised as to its applicability. We find here that we gave them $3,000,000 and that they expended less than that sum. Now, we find them this year, with an increased population and increased duties, asking for only $1,682,116.

Mr. GALLINGER. But, Mr. President, that does not include the meat-inspection service. They are asking for the amount stated by the Senator as against $1,654,750 last year. What they ask this year is almost exactly what is granted to them in this bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator's suggestion came before I had concluded my statement. I was reading from the bill. The total for the Bureau of Animal Industry is $1,682,116.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is less than for the meat-inspection service.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. I am perfectly aware of the item, which I have close at hand here, covering the meat-inspection service.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will understand that the $3,000,000 is an annual appropriation and goes on forever unless we repeal the law authorizing it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. The other is one that we must provide for every year. As to the $3,000,000 appropriation, I do not believe that the Secretary had really the right, under the legislation then provided, to put in beforehand the exact number of employees and the salary that would be paid to them; but he would have to specify afterwards what they were paid and that they were paid out of the $3,000,000, of course. The whole debate at the time the original law was passed, and the intent, seemed to be to place that sum of money untrammeled in the hands of the Secretary to be used as economically as possible, but with the provision that he was to be thoroughly alive to the situation, to hire whatever was necessary in the way of help, and to incur whatever expense was needed to carry out the object of the provision.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it amounts to a commission form of government. You give the Secretary a large sum of money, being sure that it will exceed the possible necessities, and you say to him, "Here is the money, go and administer the government." That is what it amounts to. You say, "We do not know whether you will need $3,000,000 or $1,000,000"——

Mr. WARREN. I think, if the Senator will allow me right there, that up to this time the appropriation has been wisely handled by the department, and that the expenditures have not been unduly extravagant. The Senator will admit that.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not inclined to criticize them. Even though they might at some time be open to criticism, I would not embarrass the consideration of this measure by reverting to that.

Mr. WARREN. But of course the Senator understands that the inauguration of this work was entirely new, and it was a very extensive problem.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was the inauguration of a form of running the Government by commission, vested in the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. WARREN. That is a quite popular mode of government just now.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have some objections to urge against it.

Mr. WARREN. So do we all have; but the Senator will admit that it is rather a popular form of government, nevertheless.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; not popular; there is much noise about it, but not many people are in favor of it. Now, how does this differ from a commission form of government? You first select a man at the head of a department, and you say to him: "Take this money and be sure you have got enough and run this government, and you select those who shall be the agents and through whom the government is run." That is government by commission. I am not clear in my mind whether it was accomplished four years ago or whether it was only inaugurated at that time. It was consummated two years ago, and at that time, if I may be pardoned for referring to my own part in it, I suggested that it was equivalent to government by commission, because it turned over to an appointed officer, to an officer whom we did not appoint and the people did not select, the power to run the government, simply giving him a round sum of money with which to do it, and requesting him to select, without any interference, those who should assist him.

In a commission form of government, through some manipulation, a certain number of men, one or more, are commissioned to administer the affairs of a city or a municipality, and they are authorized to dip into the treasury, which is the pockets of the people—it does not matter what form it may take afterwards—and get money enough with which to run the government, and then to select their own agencies. That is what is called "government by commission." No thoughtful American citizen who really understands what our Government stands for will favor that kind of government after he understands it. When he begins to think, he may suppose he understands it and approves it, but if he is capable of ultimate thought, he will not think so when he has thought.

Mr. President, I am not going, at this time at least, to deliver a homily on government by commission. I intend on some other occasion to express myself upon that question, because I have found some very good men, in whom I have had confidence, favoring government by commission. Of course, after a little while they will not favor it, for they will find that they have simply appointed guardians for themselves, and that they have the same rights that a ward has under a guardian.

Mr. President, I am not going to hinder the progress of this bill. I wanted to get this idea in the minds of some Senators, if only one—I hope in the minds of all Senators—that the lump-sum appropriation is a violation of the Constitution; it is a violation of the principles of our Government, and it is a violatin of good common sense.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is interesting to have the Senator call the attention of the Senate to that fact, because manifestly the Congress has been getting along as best it could in violation of the Constitution of the United States. There is not an appropriation bill, including this one, that does not provide lump-sum appropriations. Take the naval appropriation bill of last year. Here [indicating] is one lump-sum item aggregating $254,654.25, and here is another aggregating a million dollars.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator might say there is a lump-sum appropriation of fifty-odd millions in the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is probably true; but I was simply calling attention to one or two items. I have called attention to an item of $1,000,000. For the Bureau of Navigation there was also a very large lump-sum appropriation—I have forgotten how much—but here, in the first paragraph in the first item, I notice an appropriation of $999,400 in a lump sum for the Bureau of Navigation, and so on through the bill. If we have been legislating unconstitutionally I do not know whether any——

Mr. HEYBURN. Whether it is worth while to reform the practice.

Mr. GALLINGER (continuing). Whether any of us are particularly to be blamed; but I think it would be a great task for the Senator to undertake—and I know his industry and capacity to do great work—it would be a great task for the Senator, I think, to take up the naval appropriation bill and separate it so that we can provide item by item for each appropriation in that bill.

I apprehend it is an impossible task, and I personally and as a member of the Committee on Appropriations would be delighted to have the Senator undertake it, and if he lives long enough to accomplish it we will all be willing, I think, to give him a vote of thanks from the Congress of the United States, for it will be a great achievement. But I think the Senator for once in his life would undertake a task that is absolutely beyond the possibility of accomplishment. That is my notion about it. I may be wrong.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I appreciate the force of what the Senator from New Hampshire says and the criticism of the Army and Navy appropriation bills, especially the Navy appropriation bill, and it was only because I did not want to overburden my criticism that I did not mention other appropriation bills.

I remember one of the ablest men who ever sat in this body who occupied the seat almost behind me, calling attention to and criticising that class of appropriations in the naval appropriation bill. I learned a great deal of wisdom from the lips of that distinguished man.

Mr. GALLINGER. And yet that same man reported the naval appropriation bill year after year.

Mr. HEYBURN. He reported it because of the action of the committee, but I never heard bills more severely criticised than they were by that Senator, even though he had reported the bill. He was one man in the committee and he was in a minority in this body in regard to his views as to naval appropriation bills.

I would not charge any man in this body with having forgotten the Constitution or with having not read it, and it matters not to me how long an error has existed if the duty rests upon me and others to correct the error. This is an ancient document. It has been discredited some in later days by men who neither know nor care what the Constitution is. I am reading now from the Constitution of the United States:

> No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think if we appropriate in a lump sum a million dollars, that is an appropriation according to law?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I do not; and the Senator from New Hampshire will not think it is after he has investigated the question. Let us give a little further attention to this:

> No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time.

Of course, no one will contend that the word "appropriation" does not mean specific appropriation, because that has been so determined; but if it had never been decided, there is no one who would contend that it did not mean a specific appropriation for a purpose named in the appropriation bill. It would not be contended by anyone that an appropriation made for the building of a battleship could be used for the building of a monument. It would not be contended by anyone that an appropriation made for the purpose of promoting the Forestry Service could be used for the purpose of maintaining the Navy.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I quite agree with the Senator on that proposition. The Senator is absolutely correct, as he usually is. A department ought not to be permitted to divert a specific appropriation for the purpose of doing something else, and if that has been done I think it ought to be stopped.

Mr. HEYBURN. Money must be appropriated for a definite purpose. This language is open to no other construction. The purpose of writing that language into the Constitution was to anchor the appropriation to a purpose. Is appropriating a lump sum of money to be used without any defined purpose within the provisions of the Constitution?

Mr. GALLINGER. The defined purpose runs all through the bill. There is a certain amount of money for the Bureau of Animal Industry; there is a certain amount of money for the Plant Bureau; and those moneys can not be diverted to any other purpose. I think it is specifically stated what they are appropriated for. The Senator's contention is that we ought to appropriate for each individual veterinary or clerk.

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, not at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. That we ought to appropriate for a certain number of them. I, of course, have great hesitancy in venturing an opinion as to the meaning of the Constitution in any controversy with the distinguished Senator from Idaho, but it does seem to me that when we appropriate a certain amount for the Bureau of Animal Industry we appropriate it for a specific and well-defined purpose, and under the Constitution it can well be used according to the terms of the appropriation. That is the way it strikes me.

Mr. HEYBURN. With all due deference to the Senator, because I have great confidence in his judgment and ability to apply the Constitution, let us see whether this is right. I say the question rests upon whose purpose?

> No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time.

It is not competent to appropriate money for the use of some other man, according to his judgment. The use must be based upon the judgment of Congress. That judgment must be a part of the purpose for which the money was appropriated, not appropriated for a purpose to be afterwards ascertained or determined by an executive officer, but for the purpose that Congress had in view when it appropriated the money. No person should be authorized to determine the purpose for which money is appropriated by Congress. Congress must not only determine the purpose, but it must express it in such language as to leave no doubt of the purpose.

I intend for the short time that I shall participate in the proceedings of this body, or whether it be short or long, to continue opposition to this method of lump-sum appropriatins, because they are in violation of the letter and of the purpose of the Constitution, and they are without warrant of reason.

Mr. President, having thus stated a general objection to this bill, to be made applicable as we reach the items that point the objection, I will let the reading of the bill proceed and confine my attention to objecting as we reach the items.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reading of the bill will be resumed.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 2, line 17, before the word "law," to strike out "seven" and insert "eight," and in line 25, before the word "messengers," to strike out "nine" and insert "twelve," so as to read:

> One law clerk, $2,200; 10 law clerks, at $2,000 each; 8 law clerks, at $1,800 each; 3 law clerks, at $1,600 each; 1 telegraph and telephone operator, $1,600; 2 clerks, class 4; 6 clerks, class 3; 10 clerks, class 2; 18 clerks, class 1; eight clerks, at $1,000 each; 6 clerks, at $900 each; 1 clerk, $840; 12 messengers or laborers, at $840 each.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to inquire whether under the joint rule regulating printing a picture, say a cartoon, can be reproduced and printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SMOOT. The Joint Committee on Printing a number of years ago passed an order that such a thing could not be printed in the RECORD, and, Mr. President, it has strictly adhered to that rule up to the present time.

Mr. STONE. I suppose that is a good rule.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is a splendid one.

Mr. STONE. There ought to be exceptions to it. There ought to be exceptions to all rules or almost all rules. I am sorry that I can not find some reason for urging an exception now.

Mr. President, there is a cartoon appearing in one of this morning's papers which I would be glad if it could, for its historical value, be incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It appears on the first page of this morning's Washington Herald. Over the top are these words, "Saint Roosevelt, by Roosevelt." Under it are the words, "Roosevelt letter, May 10: 'There is just one candidate whom it is possible to nominate against the bosses, and that is myself.'"

Mr. BORAH. Is there any way by which we can have that cartoon reproduced in the RECORD?

Mr. SMOOT. There is not.

Mr. BURNHAM. May I——

Mr. SMOOT. There is no one whom I should like to favor in this regard more than the distinguished Senator from Missouri, but as it has been the rule in the past and the appeal has been made to the joint committee not once, but, since I have been a member of the committee, a hundred times——

Mr. STONE. I am not making an appeal.

Mr. SMOOT. And we have refused to do so, therefore we can not reproduce this picture in the RECORD. I was merely stating the reason why.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, I was not aware of yielding the floor.

Mr. STONE. I have taken the floor in my own right.

Mr. BURNHAM. I ask the Chair how it fits into the appropriation bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri obtained the floor in his own right, and the Chair assumes that his remarks apply to the bill under consideration.

Mr. BURNHAM. What I made was simply a query of the Chair. It may have great pertinency to this bill, but I am not aware of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Missouri, under the head of "Animal industry," is speaking of the human industry.

Mr. STONE. I think that is a very pertinent suggestion. I will restate the case. Over the cartoon are the words "Saint Roosevelt, by Roosevelt," and under the cartoon are the words "Roosevelt letter, May 10: 'There is just one candidate whom it is possible to nominate against the bosses, and that is myself.'"

In the cartoon itself are two pictures of Col. Roosevelt, one in propria persona, as he is usually presented; that is to say, with his military hat on, his boots and spurs, with his eyeglasses on, and his teeth exposed and some indescribable heavy weapon in his right hand, and a shield presented in front held in his left hand; and just beyond that is another figure of the redoubtable colonel pictured as an angel of death or destruction, and the colonel in his proper person is looking with approval upon the angel. The angel in his left hand has a miniature human being grasped by the throat, labeled "political boss," and in his right hand another miniature being grasped by the throat labeled "the trusts," and these two he is strangling.

I should like to have the cartoon revised a little bit and print it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, if that be possible.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why does not the Senator from Missouri ask unanimous consent?

Mr. STONE. I should like to have it revised, so as to be more accurately representative of the real truth of history. It is all right except in one particular. I would make it a little more personal than this artist has made it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Missouri suspend for a moment? The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 18642) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am advised that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry desires to go on with the appropriation bill. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, upon the request of the Senator from North Carolina, the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside. The Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. STONE. I am about through. I said that I would make it a little more personal and thereby a little better fit the case. For instance, in the strong right hand of this Roosevelt angel of destruction, instead of holding the trusts I would hold Perkins, and in the left hand instead of holding the political boss I would hold McCormick—Perkins of the Steel Trust in the right hand and McCormick of the Harvester Trust in the other hand—and then with both his feet planted upon the writhing form of Munsey, who belongs to both. Then you would have a picture that ought to go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be so revised in the way I have indicated and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Who will be the artist?

Mr. SMOOT. I take it for granted that the words spoken by the Senator from Missouri will appear in the RECORD, and that that is sufficient. Therefore I object to the request as far as it relates to printing in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the request.

Mr. STONE. That shows, Mr. President, that the Senator from Utah is not entirely and intensely a Taft man, as I thought he was. He is playing both ends against the middle.

Mr. SMOOT. I rather think that that remark by the Senator from Missouri is uncalled for. That the record may be absolutely straight, I will say that no matter what the request of the Senator had been, I would have objected the same way under the rule of the Senate. It is not because I love Roosevelt more and Taft less or Taft more and Roosevelt less; it is not a question of politics; it is a question as to what shall go into the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment on page 2, line 17 and line 24, will be agreed to, and the reading of the bill will be continued.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 11, page 32.

Mr. BORAH. On what page is the Secretary reading?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary is about reporting the amendment at line 10, on page 32.

Mr. BORAH. Have we passed over the amendments on page 29? My attention was diverted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Both those amendments were agreed to by unanimous consent. We can return to them, if the Senator desires.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to submit some remarks upon the bill at this time, unless the chairman of the committee would prefer to have the bill read through and permit me to do so afterwards.

Mr. BURNHAM. I would rather have the bill read first, proceeding as we are now doing, if the Senator does not object.

Mr. LODGE. And we will pass over those amendments.

Mr. BORAH Would the Senator be willing to pass over the Forest Service items and go back to them? My colleague, who has just left the Chamber, said he desired to give some attention to those items.

Mr. WARREN. We will pass them over.

Mr. BURNHAM. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, all the amendments under the head of "Forest Service" will be passed over, and those which were marked as agreed to, on lines 17, 18, 19, and 20, page 29, are considered as not agreed to. Does the Senator from Idaho desire his request to include the general expenses of the Forest Service, at page 32?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

There are no amendments under the Forest Service I see, except on the first two or three pages.

Mr. WARREN. On pages 48 and 49 there are amendments that I presume the Senator would not care to have us pass over, but between page 29 and page 40 it is all forestry and they might well go over together.

Mr. BORAH. I think I do not care to have the exception follow on page 48.

Mr. WARREN. Then the reading can begin at line 11, on page 48.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Idaho not to desire to have the part between page 32 and page 48 passed over. Is the Chair right?

Mr. BORAH. I desire to have all the items, beginning under the head of "Forest Service" on page 28, passed over until we get to page 48.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Very good. The Chair misunderstood the Senator. The reading will begin at line 11, page 48.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 12, after the word "dollars" to insert: "Provided, That all of the military reservation of Fort Wingate, N. Mex., as described in Executive order of May 31, 1911 (No. 1367), shall become a part of the Zuni National Forest and shall so remain until said order shall be revoked, modified, or suspended by the President, but that the said lands shall remain subject to the unhampered use of the War Department for military purposes, and to insure such use the land shall not be subject to any form of appropriation or disposal under the land laws of the United States;" so as to make the clause read:

Zuni National Forest, N. Mex. and Ariz., $3,734: Provided, That all of the military reservation of Fort Wingate, N. Mex., as described in Executive order of May 31, 1911 (No. 1367), shall become a part of the Zuni National Forest and shall so remain until said order shall be revoked, modified, or suspended by the President, but that the said lands shall remain subject to the unhampered use of the War Department for military purposes, and to insure such use the land shall not be subject to any form of appropriation or disposal under the land laws of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, line 3, before the word "thirty-two," to insert: "and lands under contract for purchase or for the acquisition of which condemnation proceedings have been instituted for the purposes of said act," so as to make the clause read:

Additional national forests to be created under section 11 of the act of March 1, 1911 (36 Stat., p. 963), and lands under contract for purchase or for the acquisition of which condemnation proceedings have been instituted for the purposes of said act, $32,590.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, after line 4, to insert:

For the expenditure under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture for survey and listing of lands within forest reserves chiefly valuable for agriculture and describing the same by metes and bounds, or otherwise, as required by the act of June 11, 1906, and the act of March 3, 1899, $50,000: Provided, however, That any such survey and the plat and field notes thereof paid for out of this appropriation shall be made by an employee of the Forest Service under the direction of the United States surveyor general, but no land listed under the act of June 11, 1906, shall pass from the forest until patent issues.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "sixty-five" and insert "eighty," and in line 4, after the word "dollars," to insert "of which sum $10,000 shall be used to investigate the best methods of distillation of Douglas fir and other northwestern species of fir and timber, and ascertain the yields of distillates of various species, and the refining and commercial use of the distillates," so as to make the clause read:

For investigations of methods for wood distillation and for the preservative treatment of timber, for timber testing and the testing of such woods as may require test to ascertain if they be suitable for making paper, and for other investigations and experiments to promote economy in the use of forest products, $180,000, of which sum $10,000 shall be used to investigate the best methods of distillation of Douglas fir and other northwestern species of fir and timber, and ascertain the yields of distillates of various species, and the refining and commercial use of the distillates.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 13, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eighteen thousand four hundred and twenty" and insert "twenty-five thousand one hundred and eighty," so as to make the clause read:

For experiments and investigations of range conditions within national forests, and of methods for improving the range by reseeding, regulation of grazing, and other means, $25,180.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 14, after the word "seed," to strike out "and" and insert ", cones, and nursery stock"; in line 18, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty thousand" and insert "seventy-six thousand six hundred and forty"; and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture may procure such seed, cones, and nursery stock by open purchase without advertisements for proposals, whenever in his discretion such method is most economical and in the public interest, and when the cost thereof will not exceed $500;" so as to make the clause read:

For the purchase of tree seed, cones, and nursery stock, for seeding and tree planting within national forests, and for experiments and investigations necessary for such seeding and tree planting, $176,640: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture may procure such seed, cones, and nursery stock by open purchase without advertisements for proposals, whenever in his discretion such method is most economical and in the public interest, and when the cost thereof will not exceed $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, line 14, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two hundred and seventy-five" and insert "five hundred," so as to make the clause read:

For the construction and maintenance of roads, trails, bridges, fire lanes, telephone lines, cabins, fences, and other improvements necessary for the proper and economical administration, protection, and development of the national forests, $500,000.

The next amendment was, on page 52, after line 2, to insert:

Provided further, That hereafter an additional 25 per cent of all moneys received from such national forests during any fiscal year, including the fiscal year 1912, shall be available at the end thereof, to be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture for the construction and maintenance of roads and trails within the national forests in the States from which such proceeds are derived; but the Secretary of Agriculture may, whenever practicable, in the construction and maintenance of such roads, secure the cooperation or aid of the proper State or Territorial authorities in the furtherance of any system of highways of which such roads may be made a part.

Mr. JONES. I think, in line 5, after the word "year," the words "ending June 30" ought to be inserted, so as to read "fiscal year ending June 30, 1912."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The Senator will perceive that the proviso reads:

Provided further, That hereafter an additional 25 per cent of all moneys received from such national forests during any fiscal year, including the fiscal year 1912.

Mr. JONES. Is that the fiscal year beginning June 30, 1911, or is it the fiscal year beginning June 30, 1912?

Mr. WARREN. It is the fiscal year beginning in 1911 and ending in 1912.

Mr. JONES. I want to make it certain; and it seemed to me it was not absolutely certain.

Mr. WARREN. The legal term and the numbers definitely make it the fiscal year 1912—the one that commences July 1, 1911, and ends July 1, 1912. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. JONES. If that is what it means, it is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be agreed to as printed in the bill, in the absence of objection.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 52, line 15, after the word "expenses," to strike out "two million eight hundred and ninety-nine thousand eight" and insert "three million two hundred and twenty-three thousand two," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $3,223,285.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 53, to insert:

Any contract or agreement heretofore or hereafter made for the sale of timber or other products of the national forests may be modified, altered, or canceled by the Secretary of Agriculture upon the application of the purchaser whenever the purchaser shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary that owing to conditions beyond the purchaser's control, and arising subsequent to the execution of the contract, the enforcement thereof will work serious hardship or injustice to the purchaser: Provided, That the United States shall in all such cases be fully reimbursed for any expenses or damages incurred in connection with said contract: Provided further, That in no case shall the stumpage price stipulated in the contract or agreement be reduced by such modification or alteration: And provided also, That nothing herein shall be construed to limit the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to modify, alter, or cancel any such contract or agreement for violation of its terms.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that that be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho asks that that paragraph be passed over. It will be so ordered.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, on page 52 the gross sum of the appropriation of $3,223,285 is for general expenses. Now, I desire to recur——

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say to the Senator that, of course, that will be subject to the point of order when we turn back.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that. I will ask later to recur to the subject of the appropriation—

For salaries and field and station expenses, including the maintenance of nurseries, collecting seed, and planting, necessary for the use, maintenance, improvement, and protection of the national forests named below—

And so forth.

I ask to recur to the part of the bill that relates to that subject.

Mr. BURNHAM. What page is that?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am merely identifying it. I was reading from page 34, but it precedes the enumeration of the items for which the appropriation is made.

Mr. BURNHAM. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that during his temporary absence the provisions for the Forestry Service from page 28 to page 40 were passed over.

Mr. HEYBURN. My colleague has advised me that that has been passed over, but I did not know to what extent, and I wanted to have it certain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the head of "Bureau of Chemistry," on page 54, line 8, after the word "inspector," to strike out "two thousand seven hundred and sixty" and insert "three thousand," so as to read:

Salaries, Bureau of Chemistry: One chemist, who shall be chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 chief clerk, $2,000; one executive clerk, $2,000; 5 clerks, class 4; 7 clerks, class 3; 1 clerk, $1,440; 12 clerks, class 2; 1 clerk, $1,300; 18 clerks, class 1; 13 clerks, at $1,020 each; 11 clerks, at $1,000 each; 18 clerks, at $900 each; 1 clerk, $840; 1 assistant property custodian, $900; 1 chief food and drug inspector, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the item of appropriation for salaries Bureau of Chemistry, on page 55, line 16, after the word "thousand," to strike out "four hundred and twenty" and insert "six hundred and sixty," so as to read:

In all, $254,660.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to the end of the clause beginning on line 18, page 55, as follows:

General expenses, Bureau of Chemistry: For necessary expenses in conducting the investigations contemplated by the act of May 15, 1862, relating to the application of chemistry to agriculture in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word, and to continue collaboration with other departments of the Government desiring chemical investigations and whose heads request the Secretary of Agriculture for such assistance, and for other miscellaneous work, as follows.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask for the rereading of that unusual expression contained at the point which the Secretary has just read. However, I will find it in a moment. This is the language:

In the most general and comprehensive sense of that word.

That is on page 55. That is another innovation in legislation. I have never known that phrase to be used in describing anything that a person might or might not do.

At the bottom of page 55 the bill says:

For necessary expenses in conducting the investigations contemplated by the act of May 15, 1862, relating to the application of chemistry to agriculture in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word—

Why not say how it is to be done? Who is going to determine what is "the most general and comprehensive sense of that word"? Let us legislate in legislative language.

And to continue collaboration—

That is a pretty indefinite phrase, too. Then it continues:

with other departments of the Government desiring chemical investigations.

Mr. President, I ask that that paragraph may go over until we have time to contemplate it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the paragraph will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of the following clause, on page 56:

For investigating the character of the chemical and physical tests which are applied to American food products in foreign countries, and for inspecting the same before shipment when desired by the shippers or owners of these products intended for countries where chemical and physical tests are required before the said products are allowed to be sold therein, and for all necessary expenses in connection with such inspection and studies of methods of analysis in foreign countries, $4,280.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill why we should make an appropriation for inspectors of meats or other food products to be exported? Our pure food and drugs act excepts that class of goods from these provisions. It is purely a matter that interests the shipper. He does it at his own hazard. Why our Government should investigate or expend money for it I am unable to see.

Mr. BURNHAM. I presume it is like other similar appropriations by the Government. It certainly would help this business if inspections were made, and it would add to the credit of the exports in foreign countries.

Mr. HEYBURN. The situation is about this: Exception is made in the pure food and drugs act as to articles that are exported to foreign countries having certain restrictions. The shipper or the exporter takes his own chance. I do not know that such an item has ever before appeared in the bill. It should not appear in any bill.

Mr. WARREN. It is the old language.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, it should never have been used. There is no reason in the world why the Government should inspect exports that are to be inspected on the other side in order to apply a penalty that may possibly be imposed against them.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. This inspection is to give the Government stamp to those products exactly the same as we do to meat products.

Mr. HEYBURN. But we except them out of the law.

Mr. WARREN. Well, you excepted some things, and others you did not.

Mr. HEYBURN. We were very specific in the things we excepted.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will notice, it is a very small sum—$4,280.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know it is. It was only the question of why we should provide for an inspection of the thing that we provided we would not inspect.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, it is not only in the law but it is in the bill as it came from the House. It is also the same language that has heretofore appeared in agricultural appropriation acts.

Mr. HEYBURN. I merely made the suggestion. I desired to point it out, in order to avoid trouble. We agreed not to inspect these products, and now we are proposing to appropriate money to inspect them.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 57, line 13, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty," so as to read:

Enforcement of the food and drugs act: For enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act of June 30, 1906, entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated, or misbranded, or poisonous, or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," in the city of Washington and elsewhere, including chemical apparatus, chemicals and supplies, repairs to apparatus, gas, electric current, official traveling expenses, telegraph and telephone service, express and freight charges, and all other expenses, employing such assistants, clerks, and other persons as may be considered necessary for the purposes named, and rent outside of the District of Columbia, $650,000.

The next aemndment was, on page 57, line 13, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Provided, That of this sum the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend not exceeding $5,000 for the purchase of all right, title, and interest in and to the Marsh test for detecting artificial coloring matter in whisky, the same being covered by letters patent 813728, which payment shall include full satisfaction for any and all use that may have heretofore been made of the said process by the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I shall have to be convinced by some statement that it is necessary for the Government to buy that patent before I consent to its doing so. I should want to know that it was a real patent, valid and effective, before the Government should buy it. It is some man's theory or method of testing whisky, I believe. Now, we probably have a dozen ways of doing that.

Mr. BURNHAM. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Wyoming to this matter.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Idaho wishes to have that item passed over, I have no objection.

Mr. HEYBURN. Just pass it over. It looks rather queer to me.

Mr. WARREN. This test is something that has been in use, and this provision is perhaps to avoid a suit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The provision will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 57, line 24, before the word "dollars," to strike out "sixty-eight thousand seven hundred" and insert "ninety-three thousand nine hundred and forty," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Chemistry, $993,940.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Soils," on page 58, line 10, after the word "dollars," to insert "one soil cartographer, $1,600"; and, in line 21, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty thousand five hundred and forty" and insert "fifty-two thousand one hundred and forty," so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, Bureau of Soils: One soil physicist, who shall be chief of bureau, $4,000; 1 chief clerk, $2,000; 1 executive assistant, $2,000; 3 clerks, class 4; 2 clerks, class 3; 3 clerks, class 2; 1 clerk, $1,260; 8 clerks, class 1; 4 clerks, at $1,000 each; 3 clerks, at $900 each; 1 soil cartographer, $1,800; 1 soil cartographer, $1,600; 1 soil bibliographer, $1,400; 1 photographer, $1,200; 3 draftsmen, at $1,200 each; 1 draftsman, $1,000; 1 messenger, $840; 2 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $480 each; 1 laborer, $600; 1 laborer, $300; 1 charwoman or laborer, $480; in all, $52,140.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to know whether that applies to a chemical investigation of known deposits or whether it is a prospecting fund?

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, I understand it is to be applied for the investigation of the possibilities of securing potash, particularly on the Pacific coast.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it for kelp investigations?

Mr. BURNHAM. It is for kelp investigations, as I understand, and——

Mr. HEYBURN. That much money might possibly be expended to corroborate what everyone out there knows, that the kelp grows on that coast and that it contains potash or that potash may be gathered from it, but why should the Government spend money to verify that fact?

Mr. BURNHAM. I do not understand it to be exclusively for the investigation of kelp, but for general investigations wherever there is any evidence of the existence of potash.

Mr. HEYBURN. My interruption was only to make the suggestion that, really, if they will restore the lands to exploration by the old-fashioned prospector, where potash is likely to be found, they will save money. He will find it if it is there.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 60, line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "sixty-five thousand" and insert "eighty-three thousand eight hundred and ninety," so as to make the clause read:

For the investigation of soils and for indicating upon maps and plats, by coloring or otherwise, the results of such investigations, $183,890.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, line 14, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty thousand eight hundred and eighty" and insert "sixty-nine thousand seven hundred and seventy," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $269,770.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, line 17, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one thousand four hundred and twenty" and insert "twenty-one thousand nine hundred and ten," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Soils, $321,910.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Entomology," on page 62, line 10, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "including the alfalfa weevil, eighty-five," so as to make the clause read:

For investigations of insects affecting cereal and forage plants, including the alfalfa weevil, $85,000, of which sum $10,000 shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 62, line 20, after the word "crops," to insert "sugar beet"; and in line 22, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "thirty-nine," so as to make the clause read:

For investigations of insects affecting truck crops, sugar beet, stored grains, and other stored products, $39,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 63, line 6, after the word "available," to strike out "Provided, That not part of this sum shall be used on the Atlantic seaboard," so as to make the clause read:

For investigations of the Mediterranean fly in the United States, its Territories and possessions, $35,000, which sum shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For investigations of miscellaneous insects, inspection work, study of insects affecting the health of man and animals, insecticides, and the importation and exchange of useful insects, $19,740.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think the word "investigations," which is used in all the provisions on the two pages, 62 and 63, is an insufficient one. The question is, What shall constitute an investigation? Is it an investigation merely to go and look at these various bugs and write a treatise about them? We have a lot of that and we have been having it for a long time, until we are thoroughly acquainted with practically every pest that has ever existed. I think this appropriation, which amounts in the aggregate to a very large sum of money, ought to be applied to a more definite purpose and use than that. I would say "for the investigation and extermination of these pests." What is the use of investigating them unless you spend some of the money to exterminate them?

Mr. BURNHAM. Investigation is a preliminary to their extermination, is it not?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is an expensive preliminary; it is like paying an entrance fee to a dining room.

Mr. BURNHAM. It is part of the same thing.

Mr. HEYBURN. If it is to be considered that investigation means destruction, then I will withdraw my criticism. I think that so large a sum of money should be applied both to investigation and destruction.

Mr. WARREN. To what sum does the Senator refer?

Mr. HEYBURN. I refer to the general expenditures.

Mr. WARREN. That covers all the foregoing items under this heading in the bill; but the item about which the Senator is speaking is $19,740.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; take all those items. I was going to add them, but the issue came too quickly, and I was unable to do so.

For investigations of insects affecting deciduous fruits, orchards, vineyards, nuts, etc., including investigations of the pear thrips, cranberry insects, and apple maggots, $40,600.

That is one item. Then comes the next item:

For investigations of insects affecting cereal and forage plants, including the alfalfa weevil, $85,000, of which sum $10,000 shall be immediately available.

The next paragraph reads:

For investigations of insects affecting southern field crops, including the cotton-boll weevil and other insects injurious to cotton, insects affecting tobacco, rice, and sugar cane, the Argentine ant, and life history studies of ticks, $47,160.

Some of those insects you can become thoroughly acquainted with without paying anything.

For investigations of insects affecting forests, $44,750.

These are large items. The expenditure of this money would probably destroy these insects.

For investigations of insects affecting truck crops, sugar beet, stored grains, and other stored products.

The amount was $24,500, but it is proposed to be amended so as to read $39,500. Then, here is an item standing out by itself:

For investigations in bee culture, $15,000.

There are a great many sources from which all the investigation that is required can be obtained in regard to the raising of bees. The department has published a most excellent work on bee culture, and I have recently given some attention to it in connection with the starting of bee culture.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, that could not be published unless we provided for the expense.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is already published.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; but there are still further items affecting bee culture.

Mr. HEYBURN. I doubt if there is anything new to be added to that science. Here are two other items:

For investigations of insects affecting citrus fruits, including the white fly, orange thrips, and scale insects, $21,500.

For investigations of the Mediterranean fly in the United States, its Territories and possessions, $35,000, which sum shall be immediately available.

Those sums added together would amount to several hundred thousand dollars. I have not, however, added them up.

Mr. WARREN. The entire footing is there—$348,250. It is on the same page, as the Senator will see.

Mr. HEYBURN. I read that, and the Senator suggested that that was for——

Mr. WARREN. It is for the expenses of the entire Bureau of Entomology.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I have read all the items under that head.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no; there are a couple of pages preceding the items the Senator has read.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; there are some smaller items there, but I am reading the large items, and, whatever the aggregate sum may be, I am going to move to amend by inserting in each case, after the word "investigations," the words "and destruction."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will venture to suggest to the Senator that he would not apply that to the item relating to bee culture, would he?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I would not apply that to bees.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have myself found considerable amusement heretofore in alluding to these various appropriations for the brown-tailed moth, the white-tailed fly, and so forth. They are always a good text and a good subject on which to deliver a humorous lecture. I always enjoy it, whether I indulge in it myself or whether I sit as a listener, but nevertheless those who are engaged in fruit culture, in bee culture, and in various other industries find that, as much as we may trifle with the brown-tailed moth and the white-tailed fly, those insects themselves are capable of doing great damage and are not to be laughed at.

I entirely agree with the Senator that they not only need investigation but destruction, but the main thing is to get the information and deliver it to those in different parts of the country who are afflicted, and to show them the way they can, through their own agencies, destroy such pests.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am in thorough sympathy with that.

Mr. WARREN. Now, one moment more. It is rather odd, perhaps, that we should provide for "investigations of miscellaneous insects" and "the exchange of useful insects." It seems immensely funny, especially so in print, but the Senator knows there are insects that destroy others and yet are themselves harmless, or nearly so. Take the alfalfa weevil, for instance. The Secretary of Agriculture, with whom I had a very interesting conversation, believes that he will be able to import an insect, harmless otherwise, that will prey upon the insect that is destroying alfalfa. Of course, the Senator knows what the value of the alfalfa crop is in this country.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am not unmindful of what the Senator says. While the inoculation of plants sometimes by insects destroys the first, the second become acclimated, and they destroy the tree; but I notice in the reservations and in the parks—my attention was called to it last evening right here within sight of the Agricultural Department—trees with nests of breeding worms. There is one right down—I do not know but what it is on the agricultural grounds; I saw it last evening—that will breed enough worms to destroy orchards and half of the trees in the public parks. I think, probably, we ought to have some of this money expended right here at home. Of course I will not apply it to bees, but I still think—of course I will not apply it to bees—that the amendment should be adopted as applying to the matter to which I have referred. The paragraphs are not numbered, and it is very difficult to find the place.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that, if the Senator in charge of the bill will agree to its insertion, I see no objection to it.

Mr. HEYBURN. These paragraphs are not numbered, but I will move to insert, after the word "investigations," on page 62, in the second paragraph, in the third paragraph, in the fourth paragraph, in the fifth paragraph, and in the sixth paragraph——

Mr. WARREN. The Senator means at the commencement of each paragraph?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. Let the words "and destruction" be inserted, and let the same words be inserted in the paragraph at the top of page 63 and in the second paragraph on that page.

Mr. WARREN. And the third.

Mr. HEYBURN. And to the third I think it would be applicable. I make that motion.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Idaho that the paragraph has heretofore been confined to the word "investigations," because of the fact that the Government simply ascertains the means of destroying these various insects, and its employees do not destroy them. If it is to include destruction of the insects on the property of anyone whose trees are inflicted with these insects, the people might ask the department to destroy them on individual trees on their farms, and it would be utterly impossible to do that. I think the department insists upon the word "investigations" so as not to encourage applications from individuals for the destruction of these insects upon their property.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia can well be complied with by inserting, after the word "investigations," the words "and for suggesting a means of destroying." That would cover it.

Mr. WARREN. I assume, of course, that the Senator from Idaho did not intend to go to the point of having the Government send its employees to destroy these insects?

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, no.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Virginia is right.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is a good suggestion, and I will accept it.

Mr. WARREN. We should inform the people as to the methods of destruction, and that is what we do through the bulletins of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask to amend the amendment I have suggested, and in each case say "investigation and instruction as to the method of destroying."

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, the word "investigations" has been in these appropriation bills for years. It has been given a definite interpretation by the department. I have applications from people all over Virginia, on whose property there are insects destroying fruit trees, to see if we can not send some Federal officials there to take care of their individual orchards, but the department, by having the word "investigations" there, and having given it an interpretation, simply spends the money in acquiring and destributing information as to how best to exterminate these insects which destroy the trees and crops.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not intend to strike out the word "investigations."

Mr. SWANSON. It has a specific meaning, and if we add to it too much some constituents of mine will think I ought to be able to get a hundred officials to take care of their orchards and crops, and if we appropriate the money with the other word included it would destroy the object of the investigations.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would not think of doing that.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I think it would be rather dangerous to put in the additional word suggested. It might be regarded, as the Senator from Virginia indicates, as an assumption of a greater burden on the part of the Government than it really ought to assume—that is, to go and kill every insect upon every farm instead of instructing the owners how to do it.

Mr. HEYBURN. My amendment proposes to give instructions as to how to destroy them.

Mr. SWANSON. The amendment would be entirely proper if it were certain to be given the interpretation which now prevails in the department. Their action is confined to instructions. The meaning of the term "investigations" has been fixed, the department having given it an interpretation, and if you change the phraseology I am afraid the department may give it another interpretation.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not want any language used that would make it necessary for the Government to send anyone to destroy the insects. My idea is that the investigation shall be crystallized into information.

Mr. SWANSON. That is all right.

Mr. WARREN. I have no doubt that that is the practice, if not the specific law or rule. The Senator from Idaho is a learned lawyer. Suppose we should pass it as it is now; the Senator can shape language such as he feels may be necessary and then we can turn back to it.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is all right.

Mr. WARREN. They are now doing exactly what the Senator wishes done.

Mr. HEYBURN. These matters are coming up rapidly. I suggest that the matter remain open for further consideration, and some one——

Mr. LODGE. The amendment can be offered at any time.

Mr. HEYBURN. The amendment can be offered at any time.

Mr. WARREN. I suggest to the Senator that, if he should have the means, he communicate with the department and get information as to what the practice is.

Mr. HEYBURN. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inquire as to the items to be passed over. Does the suggestion embrace the matter from line 5, on page 62, to line 8, on page 63? Was that the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LODGE. If I may make a suggestion, there is no need of passing over any item. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Idaho will be in order at any time. Any Senator can offer an amendment to the bill. The Senator from Idaho does not propose to strike out; he proposes to add new words.

Mr. WARREN. And those words do not take the place of any committee amendments, and they are in order at any time.

Mr. HEYBURN. If they do not come under the rule of the Senate that no amendment now adopted can be attacked until the bill comes into the Senate——

Mr. LODGE. They are not amendments to amendments, but amendments to the text of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will turn to the heading "Bureau of Entomology," on page 61, he will find that the very point he has contended for is expressed in the first paragraph:

> General expenses, Bureau of Entomology: For the promotion of economic entomology; for investigating the history and the habits of insects injurious and beneficial to agriculture, horticulture, and arboriculture, and ascertaining the best means of destroying those found to be injurious.

It specifies to investigate those that are beneficial or injurious and the best means of destroying the injurious ones.

Mr. HEYBURN. We can see about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was, on page 63, line 14, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two hundred and ninety-eight" and insert "three hundred and forty-eight," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $348,250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 64, line 4, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty-one" and insert "ninety-one," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Entomology, $691,840.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I inadvertently passed over the provision in reference to the transportation of game, page 65, end of the paragraph nearest the top.

This is probably one of the questions that creates more disturbance than almost any other provision in the law. It says:

For the enforcement of sections 241, 242, 243, and 244 of the act approved March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," and for the enforcement of section 1 of the act approved May 25, 1900, entitled "An act to enlarge the powers of the Department of Agriculture, prohibit the transportation by interstate commerce of game killed in violation of local laws, and for other purposes," $12,000.

There has been a great deal of evasion of the law. The attempt to enforce this law has resulted in more or less corruption. The law has not been enforced. Certain sections of the United States are supplied with interstate game all the year round. Certain men are tried for an infraction of the law. I do not know whether any of them have been convicted or not. But it creates a disturbance.

It was not wise to enlarge the powers of the Department of Agriculture in this respect. The Department of Agriculture was an inappropriate medium through which to deal between the United States and the States. There is State legislation in regard to game. I presume every State in the United States has such legislation. We have various laws in the States in the West and Northwest which are not harmonious at all, and the question continually arises as to whether or not game taken in one State may be taken into another, and if it is taken there in violation of the law of the State within which it is taken, and if it is not in violation of the law of the State into which it is taken complications arise, because the attempts to follow up the individuals who did it have generally been followed with resistance. The officers have been utterly unable or impotent to enforce the restrictions on the sending of game from one State to another.

In fact, we should repeal that provision of the act which undertakes to confer upon the Department of Agriculture the power to prohibit the transportation in interstate commerce of game when taken in violation of the law. In other words, we should not make any of the executive departments of the Government the custodian of these rights. They are rights controverted between the State and the General Government, and I do not believe the General Government, under the interstate-commerce law or any other, will again delegate to the secretary of a department the right to say who shall and who shall not ship game from one State to another. It has caused very much important litigation and it has caused great disturbance.

Mr. WARREN. Of course the Senator from Idaho will observe that this does not enact a law.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know.

Mr. WARREN. It simply appropriates.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am criticizing the law as it exists.

Mr. WARREN. The existing law. But this is not the proper place in which to correct it.

Mr. HEYBURN. It should be corrected in some place. I make the suggestion here as we go along. I think it wise and that it would be beneficial. I deem it well enough to direct the attention of Senators to questions of this kind, where the practical operations of systems demonstrate the fact, between sessions, so to speak, that they are not wise.

They ship to Idaho quail from Minnesota and the Dakotas, which are two States where they had a closed season on quail for 17 years. The closed season is over, but last year I think for the first time. Very early we prohibited the killing of quail, and yet they would come in to our State from other States. Now, does Congress want to give the control of that important question to a bureau or department of the Government?

I merely call attention to it as we pass along so that some mind may attach itself to the situation and give it consideration.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the head of "Bureau of Biological Survey," on page 65, after line 17, to insert:

For the establishment of a national game preserve, to be known as the Wind Cave National Game Preserve, upon the lands embraced within the boundaries of the Wind Cave National Park, in the State of South Dakota, for a permanent national range for a herd of bison to be presented to the United States by the American Bison Society, and for such other native American animals as may be placed therein. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to acquire by purchase or condemnation such other lands as may be necessary for the purpose of assuring an adequate, permanent water supply at a cost not exceeding the sum of $15,000, which amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the said purpose, is hereby appropriated. There is hereby further appropriated the sum of $17,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to inclose the said game preserve with a good and substantial fence and to erect thereon all necessary sheds and buildings for the proper care and maintenance of the said animals; in all, the sum of $32,000, to be available until expended.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that the amendments on pages 65, 66, and 67 be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendments on pages 65, 66, and the first amendment on page 67 will be passed over for the present.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill on page 67, line 11.

Mr. HEYBURN. The reading should be resumed at page 66, line 14.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Senator from North Dakota request that the amendment on page 67 be likewise passed over?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from North Dakota did not ask that the amendment in regard to fur-bearing animals, on page 66, be passed over, did he?

Mr. GRONNA. No; I did not.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; only down to line 13, on page 66.

Mr. WARREN. I understood the Senator to ask to have the game-preserve amendments go over.

Mr. HEYBURN. Down to line 13, on page 66.

The reading of the bill was resumed on page 66, line 14.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 66, line 17, after the word "animals," to strike out "thirty-nine thousand dollars" and insert "and for investigations and experiments in connection with rearing of fur-bearing animals, including mink and marten, $43,000, of which sum $3,000 shall be used for the destruction of ground squirrels on the national forests in California," so as to make the clause read:

For investigating the food habits of North American birds and mammals in relation to agriculture, horticulture, and forestry, including experiments and demonstrations in destroying noxious animals, and for investigations and experiments in connection with rearing of fur-bearing animals, including mink and marten, $43,000, of which sum $3,000 shall be used for the destruction of ground squirrels on the national forests in California.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 66, line 26, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty," so as to make the clause read:

For biological investigations, including the relations, habits, geographic distribution, and migrations of animals and plants, and the preparation of maps of the life and crop zones, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, line 18, before the word "dollars," to strike out "ninety-one thousand three hundred" and insert "one hundred and eighty-seven thousand three hundred," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $187,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, line 21, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one hundred and sixteen thousand four hundred" and insert "two hundred and twelve thousand four hundred," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Biological Survey, $212,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Division of Accounts and Disbursements," on page 67, line 24, after the word "who," to insert "hereafter"; on page 68, line 2, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand seven hundred and fifty" and insert "four thousand"; in line 3, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two thousand five hundred" and insert "two thousand seven hundred and fifty"; and in line 15, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "four," so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, Division of Accounts and Disbursements: One chief of division and disbursing clerk, who hereafter shall be administrative officer of the fiscal affairs of the department, $4,000; one assistant chief of division, $2,750; * * * one custodian of records and files, $1,400.

Mr. LODGE. I should like the chairman of the committee to state whether the amendment restores the salary of the chief and disbursing officer of this division to what it is at present or whether it is an increase.

Mr. BURNHAM. It is an increase.

Mr. LODGE. It is an increase?

Mr. BURNHAM. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. The House provision left the salary as it is now. The present salary is $3,750.

Mr. BURNHAM. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Why are those salaries raised?

Mr. BURNHAM. The services rendered by that gentleman, both to the committee and to the public, are very great, and he is familiar, as chief of the Bureau of Accounts and Disbursements, with all the salaries and all the business of the department in that way, and is very helpful there.

Then, he has charge of all the disbursements of $16,000,000; and, in addition to that, the White Mountains and Appalachian appropriation will increase, and it has already increased to some extent, his work. So the amount to be disbursed will be increased by millions each year.

Mr. LODGE. Does that apply to the assistant chief also?

Mr. BURNHAM. He has to do with certain divisions. For instance, he has to do with the Weather Bureau. He makes the payments to the Weather Bureau employees and he has the place of the chief in the latter's absence.

Mr. LODGE. How does this salary compare with the salaries in other departments?

Mr. WARREN. As the chairman has stated, the Chief of the Division of Accounts and Disbursements is a very able man, and he has a great deal of business to do. He has less salary than those of equal responsibility in the Treasury Department.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I wanted to find out.

Mr. WARREN. And perhaps more responsibility than men in some other departments who have less to do. He is not only one of the most capable men, but his duties are of a financial and a fiscal nature as related to all that department.

I may say, further, that the increased salary has been recommended and estimated for a number of years. The committee has been very economical about it and has raised it once or twice $250, and the last time, a year ago, there was an understanding in the committee that on the next bill they would put the salary at this figure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 68, after line 18, to insert:

Provided, That hereafter employees of the Division of Accounts and Disbursements may be detailed by the Secretary of Agriculture for accounting and disbursing work in any of the bureaus and offices of the department for duty in or out of the city of Washington, and employees of the bureaus and offices of the department may also be detailed to the Division of Accounts and Disbursements for duty in or out of the city of Washington, traveling expenses of employees so detailed to be paid from the appropriation of the bureau or office in connection with which such travel is performed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 69, line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one hundred and three thousand nine hundred and twenty" and insert "one hundred and four thousand six hundred and twenty," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Division of Accounts and Disbursements, $104,620.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Division of Publications," on page 69, line 12, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two thousand two hundred and fifty" and insert "two thousand five hundred"; in line 14, before the word "assistant," to strike out "one" and insert "four"; in the same line, after the word "assistant," to strike out "editor" and insert "editors"; in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "each"; in line 15, before the word "assistant," to strike out "four" and insert "one"; in the same line, after the word "assistant," to strike out "editors" and insert "editor"; in the same line, before the word "one," to strike out "at"; in line 16, after the word "dollars," to strike out "each"; in line 19, after the word "dollars," to insert "one draftsman or photographer, $1,600"; in line 22, after the word "dollars," to strike out "two" and insert "one"; in the same line, before the word "or," to strike out "draftsmen" and insert "draftsman"; in the same line, after the word "or," to strike out "photographers" and insert "photographer"; in line 23, before the word "one," to strike out "at"; in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out "each" and insert "one draftsman or photographer, $1,300"; and in line 25, before the word "draftsmen," to strike out "six" and insert "five," so as to read:

Salaries, Division of Publications: One editor, who shall be chief of division, $3,250; one editor, who shall be assistant chief of division, $2,500; one chief clerk, $2,000; two assistant editors, at $2,000 each; four assistant editors, at $1,800 each; one assistant editor, $1,600; one assistant editor, $1,400; one assistant editor in charge of indexing, $2,000; one indexer, $1,400; one assistant in charge of illustrations, $2,000; one draftsman or photographer, $1,600; one draftsman or photographer, $1,500; one draftsman or photographer, $1,400; one draftsman or photographer, $1,300; five draftsmen or photographers, at $1,200 each.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to have some reason assigned for increasing the salary of the editor.

One editor, who shall be chief of division, $3,250; one editor, who shall be assistant chief of division, $2,250.

It is proposed to increase it to $2,500. Of course, I suppose practice has established the meaning of the designation "one editor who shall be chief of division." Chief of what division? Chief of the editorial division? Chief of the Division of Publications?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Why is the assistant editor's salary to be raised?

Mr. BURNHAM. It is stated here in a communication from the department:

This was included in the estimates, but was not approved by the House committee. It is for the purpose of giving promotion to an employee who has served long and faithfully and rendered exceptionally efficient service.

"Three assistant editors, increase from $1,600 to $1,800 each."

This item was included in the estimates but was not passed by the House committee. All these men are exceptionally efficient, and every one of them saves his salary annually in the economies effected in printing. They are now and for several years have been underpaid, receiving less than editors in other departments.

Mr. HEYBURN. There are four assistant editors at $1,800 each.

Mr. BURNHAM. I think the increase is $200.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let us see how many editors there are there. There seems to be an unusual number of editors. It says in the bill:

One assistant editor at $1,600.

Mr. BURNHAM. I think it is a promotion.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will not raise any objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. On page 70, line 10, I desire to offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that that part of the bill has not been reached.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I thought we were on that page now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; page 69.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for "salaries, Division of Publications," on page 70, line 4, before the word "hundred," to strike out "six" and insert "eight"; in line 10, before the word "clerks," to strike out "six" and insert "seven"; in line 11, before the word "clerks," to strike out "fourteen" and insert "thirteen"; in line 12, before the word "clerks," to strike out "thirty-seven" and insert "forty-two," so as to read:

One assistant photographer, $900; 1 assistant in charge of document section, $2,000; 1 assistant in document section, $1,800; 1 foreman, miscellaneous distribution, $1,500; 1 assistant foreman, miscellaneous distribution, $1,100; 1 foreman, Farmers' Bulletin distribution, $1,200; 1 forewoman, $1,400; 1 forewoman, $1,200; 1 clerk, class 2; 7 clerks, class 1; 13 clerks, at $1,000 each; 42 clerks, at $900 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. In line 10 I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

Mr. LODGE. Is it a committee amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is an amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, and the Chair is of the opinion that consent was given to consider first committee amendments. If the Senator from New Jersey will withhold the amendment until the committee amendments are disposed of, it will be in order.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. All right.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like the attention of the chairman of the committee. On line 8, page 70——

Mr. BURNHAM. That is a similar amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. I think the committee will agree to this when I call their attention to it.

Mr. BURNHAM. Perhaps the Senator had better wait until the reading of the bill shall have been concluded.

Mr. SWANSON. I may not be here then, and I should like very much to have it taken up now. The bill says:

One foreman, Farmers' Bulletin distribution, $1,200; 1 forewoman, $1,400; 1 forewoman, $1,200.

Mr. BURNHAM. I will say to the Senator that I am not aware of any objection to the amendment, but the Senator who was last on the floor was asked to wait, and I must ask the Senator from Virginia to wait.

Mr. SWANSON. Very well.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment was, on page 70, line 13, before the word "clerks," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twenty-one"; in line 16, before the word "skilled," to strike out "twenty-seven" and insert "twenty-six"; in line 19, before the word "folders," to strike out "four" and insert "1 assistant chief folder, $960; three"; in line 20, after the word "each," to insert "1 skilled laborer, $1,100"; in line 21, before the word "skilled," to strike out "three" and insert "two"; and on page 71, line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one hundred and ninety-three thousand two hundred and twenty" and insert "one hundred and ninety-five thousand three hundred and fifty," so as to read:

Twenty-one clerks, at $840 each; 20 skilled laborers, at $840 each; 13 skilled laborers, at $780 each; 26 skilled laborers, at $720 each; 1 chief folder, $1,000; 1 assistant chief folder, $960; 3 folders, at $900 each; 1 skilled laborer, $1,100; 2 skilled laborers, at $1,000 each; 2 messengers, at $840 each; 4 messengers, at $720 each; 3 messengers, at $600 each; 2 messengers or messenger boys, at $480 each; 2 messengers or messenger boys, at $420 each; 2 messengers or messenger boys, at $360 each; 2 laborers, at $660 each; 1 laborer, $600; 4 charwomen, at $480 each; 3 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $195,350.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 72, line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eighteen thousand two hundred and twenty" and insert "twenty thousand three hundred and fifty," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Division of Publications, $220,350.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Statistics," on page 73, after line 19, to insert:

That hereafter there shall be in the Bureau of Statistics, in the Department of Agriculture, a division to be known as the division of markets. The chief of said division shall receive a salary of $3,000 per annum and the assistant chief a salary of $2,500 per annum. There shall also be in said division such special agents, clerks, and other employees as may be necessary to fulfill the duties thereof in or out of the District of Columbia.

That the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics shall have power and authority to make, through the said Division of Markets, under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, investigation as to the systems of marketing farm products, cooperative or otherwise, in practice in various sections of the United States and in foreign countries, and shall collect data in reference thereto. The information and data thus collected shall be distributed to farmers, farmers' organizations, and societies of consumers throughout the various agricultural sections of the country and made available for the use of any individual or organization, either by the circulation of printed bulletins and telegrams or by information given personally by special agents of said bureau. It shall also be the duty of said Chief of the Bureau of Statistics to make, through the said Division of Markets, under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, investigation of demands for farm products in various trade centers and the current movement of such products, giving specific data as to the supply, normal demand, and price thereof, with the view of furnishing information as to the best available markets, which information shall be distributed under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture.

That it shall be the duty of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics to collect, through the said Division of Markets, by any expeditious method, as by telegraph, telephone, mail, or otherwise, compile, and report to farmers, farmers' organizations, and societies of consumers daily bulletins or telegraphic reports of such information and statistics as will enable them to adopt plans of marketing that may facilitate the handling of farm products at a minimum cost: Provided, That when such reports or statistics are requested to be furnished by telegraph or telephone, or methods other than the United States mail, the person or association making such request must advance the fee for the cost of transmission, which shall be deposited to the appropriation for the maintenance of the said Division of Markets. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to make an annual report to Congress regarding the work of the said Division of Markets, with any recommendations that may enable Congress to enact any additional necessary legislation.

That the Secretary of Agriculture shall make all necessary arrangements for offices and supplies for the use of said Division of Markets, including office equipment, rent in or out of the District of Columbia, stationery, telegraphing, and all other necessary expenses. The compensation of clerks and employees not otherwise specifically provided for in this act shall be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture subject to the restrictions of existing law.

That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the expenses of such division, to be available during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

Mr. LODGE. That amendment is, I think, embodied in a bill now pending on the calendar. I dare say it is a very good measure, but it is a very large measure to put on an appropriation bill in the form of an amendment. It is clearly general legislation. I think it ought to pass as a separate bill, and I make the point of order that it is general legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LODGE subsequently said: Mr. President, I merely desire to say that in making the point of order I had no desire to cut off discussion. If any Senator wishes to speak to the amendment, I am perfectly willing to withhold it. Nor have I, I think, any objection to the substance of the amendment, but I believe we ought to pass it in the form of a bill. It seems to me we ought not to put it on an appropriation bill, where I think we should avoid legislation as much as possible. I did not intend to cut off any debate by making the point of order. If any Senator desires to speak, I will gladly withhold the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am not prepared to deny that if the point of order is pressed the provision for a division of markets must go out of the appropriation bill.

I will, however, explain to the Senate, by courtesy of the Senator from Massachusetts, the purpose of the measure and why we embodied it in the appropriation bill. There is a bill upon the same subject reported unanimously from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to the Senate, which is on the Senate Calendar.

We believe the measure has real merit and there are advantages to be derived from passing it as a part of the appropriation bill. The Department of Agriculture already has a Statistical Bureau. The work of this bureau is mainly to gather information with reference to the amount of crops produced by the farmers in our country.

Through this new division it is intended that information shall be gathered as to the consumption and demand for farm products. It is expected that the division will gather this information with reference to the staple crops and also with reference to the perishable products. With a division prepared to furnish, on application, to farmers the demand for both staple and perishable crops and also prepared to furnish consumers the localities in which crops, especially perishable crops, can be easily purchased, the farmers will be substantially aided in marketing their crops.

It is proposed that through this division investigations as to the system of marketing farm products, cooperative or otherwise, in practice in the various sections of the United States and in foreign countries shall be collected. This information is to be distributed to farmers and farm organizations and also to societies of consumers throughout the various agricultural sections of the country and to be made available for use of any individual or organization, either by the circulation of printed bulletins and telegrams or by information given personally by special agents.

It is provided that investigation shall be made of the demand for farm products in the various trade centers and the current movements of such products, giving specific data as to supply, normal demand, and price, with the view of furnishing information as to the best available market. It is also provided that by telegraph, mail, or otherwise reports shall be made to the farmers and farm organizations, furnishing to them information and statistics which may enable them to adopt the best plans of marketing to facilitate the handling of farm products at the lowest cost.

It is believed that the measure will be a real help to the farmers throughout the country. It has received the approval of the president of the Farmers' Union and of leading members of that organization and of other farm organizations.

The Secretary of Agriculture has approved it. Similar measures are pending in the House in the shape of bills creating bureaus, either in the Department of Commerce and Labor or in the Department of Agriculture.

We believed that a bureau is unnecessary and that the most economic way to do the work was to make it a division in the present Statistical Bureau of the Department of Agriculture. If it is passed in its present shape, it will readily be accepted in the House and immediate action would seem to be sure.

We have put the measure in a bureau of the Agricultural Department, where a good deal of the same kind of work is already being done, and if it can remain in the appropriation bill without objection and be passed by the Senate the final passage of the measure will be substantially facilitated.

Mr. LODGE. I had not examined the provision with any care. I had supposed that it created a new bureau. It seemed to me to open the door to very large and indefinite expenses. I now understand that it is merely to add a division to the existing statistical bureau.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; that is all.

Mr. LODGE. After listening to the explanation of the Senator from Georgia, it seems to me it is a measure which would be of very great benefit to the farmers, and I withdraw the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is withdrawn. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 76, line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty" and insert "ninety," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Statistics, $290,680.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Library, Department of Agriculture," on page 76, line 12, after the word "three," to strike out "$1,600," so as to make the clause read:

Salaries, library, Department of Agriculture: One librarian, $2,000; 1 clerk, class 3; 1 clerk, class 2; 2 clerks, class 1, 1 of whom shall be a translator; 5 clerks, at $1,000 each; 5 clerks, at $900 each; 1 clerk, $840; 2 cataloguers, at $1,200 each; 3 cataloguers, at $1,000 each; 1 messenger, $720; 3 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $480 each; 1 charwoman, $480; in all, $25,780.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 77, line 6, after the words "Total for," to strike out "library" and insert "Library," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Library, $41,280.

The amendment was agreed to.

Provided, That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture may purchase stationery, supplies, furniture, and miscellaneous materials from this appropriation and transfer the same at actual cost to the various bureaus, divisions, and offices of the Department of Agriculture in the city of Washington, reimbursement therefor to be made to this appropriation by said bureaus, divisions, and offices from their lump-fund appropriations by transfer settlements through the Treasury Department.

So as to make the clause read:

Contingent expenses, Department of Agriculture: For stationery, blank books, twine, paper, gum, dry goods, soap, brushes, brooms, mats, oils, paints, glass, lumber, hardware, ice, fuel, water and gas pipes, heating apparatus, furniture, carpets, and matting; for lights, freight, express charges, advertising, telegraphing, telephoning, postage, washing towels, and necessary repairs and improvements to buildings, grounds, and heating apparatus; for the purchase, subsistence, and care of horses and the purchase and repair of harness and vehicles, for official purposes only; for the payment of duties on imported articles, and the Department of Agriculture's proportionate share of the expense of the dispatch agent in New York; for official traveling expenses; and for other miscellaneous supplies and expenses not otherwise provided for and necessary for the practical and efficient work of the department, $106,066: Provided, That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture may purchase stationery, supplies, furniture, and miscellaneous materials from this appropriation and transfer the same at actual cost to the various bureaus, divisions, and offices of the Department of Agriculture in the city of Washington, reimbursement therefor to be made to this appropriation by said bureaus, divisions, and offices from their lump-fund appropriations by transfer settlements through the Treasury Department: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture may hereafter exchange typewriters and computing, addressing, and duplicating machines purchased from any lump-fund appropriation of the Department of Agriculture.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Office of Experiment Stations," on page 82, line 23, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twelve" and insert "sixteen," so as to make the clause read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 83, line 11, after the word "dollars," to insert "Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a thorough investigation to be made and report to Congress at the opening of the next session upon the feasibility and the economy of irrigation by the reservoir system or plan in western Kansas and western Oklahoma," so as to make the clause read:

Irrigation investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the laws of the States and Territories as affecting irrigation and the rights of appropriators, and of riparian proprietors and institutions relating to irrigation, and upon the use of irrigation water, at home and abroad, with especial suggestions of the best methods for the utilization of irrigation waters in agriculture, and upon the use of different kinds of power and appliances for irrigation, and for the preparation and illustration of reports and bulletins on irrigation, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, rent outside of the District of Columbia, and all necessary expenses, $98,300: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a thorough investigation to be made and report to Congress at the opening of the next session upon the feasibility and the economy of irrigation by the reservoir system or plan in western Kansas and western Oklahoma.

The next amendment was, on page 83, line 24, after the word "Washington," to insert "and elsewhere, rent outside the District of Columbia," and on page 84, line 1, before the word "dollars," to strike out "ninety-six thousand seven hundred" and insert "one hundred and twenty-five thousand," so as to make the clause read:

Drainage investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the drainage of swamp and other wet lands which may be made available for agricultural purposes, and to prepare plans for the removal of surplus waters by drainage from such lands, and for the preparation and illustration of reports and bulletins on drainage, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, rent outside of the District of Columbia, and all necessary expenses, $125,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 84, line 4, before the word "hundred," to strike out "sixty-four thousand four" and insert "ninety-six thousand seven," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Office of Experiment Stations, $1,896,700.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Office of Public Roads," on page 85, after line 22, to insert:

For conducting field experiments and various methods of road construction and maintenance, and investigations concerning various road materials and preparations; for investigating and developing equipment intended for the preparation and application of bituminous and other binders; for the purchase of materials and equipment; for the employment of assistants and labor; for the erection of buildings; such experimental work to be confined as nearly as possible to one point during the fiscal year, $30,000.

In all, for general expenses, $165,100.

The next amendment was, on page 86, line 13, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred and seventy-two" and insert "two hundred and two," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Office of Public Roads, $202,120.

The next amendment was, on page 86, after line 14, to insert:

And not to exceed 10 per cent of the foregoing amounts for the miscellaneous expenses of the work of any bureau, division, or office herein provided for shall be available interchangeably for expenditures on the objects included within the general expenses of such bureau, division, of office, but no more than 10 per cent shall be added to any one item of appropriation except in cases of extraordinary emergency, and then only upon the written order of the Secretary of Agriculture.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 87, line 3, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifteen million six hundred and forty-six thousand three hundred and sixty-six" and insert "sixteen million five hundred and nine thousand nine hundred and seventy-six," so as to make the clause read:

Total, Department of Agriculture, for routine and ordinary work, $16,509,976.

The reading was continued to page 87, line 22, the last paragraph being as follows:

Enforcement of the insecticide act: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act of April 26, 1910, entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded Paris greens, lead arsenates, and other insecticides, and also fungicides, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," in the city of Washington and elsewhere, including chemical apparatus, chemicals, and supplies, repairs to apparatus, gas, electric current, official traveling expenses, telegraph and telephone service, express and freight charges, and all other expenses, employing such assistants, clerks, and other persons as may be considered necessary for the purposes named, $87,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, that seems like a most extravagant appropriation to make for the enforcement of an act. The Agricultural Department can only present the matter or cause it to be presented to the courts. The law is enforceable in the courts and not in the Agriculture Department. They are not given any jurisdiction to enforce the law by the terms of the act. Why should it be necessary for them to spend $87,000 in order to induce the courts to enforce the law?

I merely suggest the objection now. I will probably later make a more effective demonstration in regard to it.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, under the head of "Miscellaneous," on page 88, line 2, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two hundred thousand" and insert "one million," so as to make the clause read:

Fighting and preventing forest fires in emergency: For fighting and preventing forest fires in cases of extraordinary emergency, $1,000,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let that amendment remain until we come to discuss the Forest Service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho desires to have it passed over?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; let it be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

The next amendment was, on page 88, after line 2, to insert:

That hereafter, when employees of the Department of Agriculture, either on lump-fund or statutory rolls, are traveling on official business in the United States, they may be allowed necessary railroad and steamboat fares, sleeping berth, and stateroom on steamboats, livery hire and stage fare, and other means of conveyance between points not accessible by railroad, but in lieu of subsistence and all other traveling expenses they may receive a per diem allowance, to be fixed by the Secretary in each case, in addition to their regular salaries, subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe.

Mr. HEYBURN. In line 4, I move to strike out the words "either lump-fund or."

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator strikes out those words, does he not also want to strike out the words "on statutory rolls"?

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course they are all statutory rolls.

Mr. WARREN. They must be one or the other.

Mr. LODGE. I think "lump-fund" is a very poor term if it did emanate from the department to be put in a statute.

Mr. WARREN. It may be a poor term, but its use is well known to designate it.

Mr. LODGE. However, it is not necessary to carry it into the statute.

Mr. WARREN. Both terms should either remain in or go out.

Mr. LODGE. Let them both be taken out.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I move, on line 4, page 88, to strike out the words "either on lump-fund or statutory rolls."

Mr. LODGE. That covers all employees.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 88, after line 13, to insert:

That hereafter officials and employees of the Department of Agriculture, either on lump-fund or statutory rolls, may, when authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture, receive reimbursement for moneys expended for street-car fares at their official headquarters when expended in the transaction of official business.

Mr. HEYBURN. In line 15, page 88, I move to strike out the words "either on lump-fund or statutory rolls."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 88, after line 19, to insert:

And in order to carry out the purposes mentioned in section 3 of the act of March 1, 1911, entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," there is hereby appropriated and made available until expended so much of the maximum sums mentioned in said section for the fiscal years 1912 to 1915, inclusive, as shall remain unexpended at the close of each of said fiscal years.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that that amendment may go over until we reach the consideration of the Forest Service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be passed over, without objection.

The next amendment was, on page 89, after line 6, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make an exhibit at the next annual meeting of the International Dry Land Congress, to be held at Lethbridge, Alberta, Canada, in October, 1912, illustrative of the investigations, products, and processes relating to farming in the subhumid region of the United States, $10,000, to be immediately available.

The next amendment was, on page 89, after line 13, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the continuous spread of the chestnut-bark disease by continuing the study of the nature and habits of the parasitic fungus causing the disease, for the purpose of discovering new methods of control, and by putting into application methods of control already discovered, $40,000, of which sum $20,000 shall be immediately available, and the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend said appropriation in such manner as he shall deem best, in cooperation with the authorities of the States concerned or with individuals, and to pay all necessary expenses for the employment of investigators, local and special agents, experts, assistants, and all labor and other necessary expenses, including rent, in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, as may be required: Provided, That of this sum not exceeding $10,000 shall be used in the study of the relation of insects to the chestnut-bark disease.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this amendment relates to a matter of very great importance, indeed. The destruction of the chestnut trees in my part of the country, and especially through the Middle States and in Pennsylvania and that region where they are very fine, is of the most serious character. We are threatened with the loss of trees of very great value and of great importance to all that country.

This amendment is thoroughly approved of, but the work, whatever it may be, ought to be done at once. There ought to be no delay, and the amount of money ought to be increased so as to enable the Secretary to deal with it immediately, if there is to be any hope of saving the chestnut trees. I move, therefore, to increase the amount from $40,000 to $80,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I took some pains to visit one of the tracts that was infected last season, and so far as my information went, I could not find that the tree was killed at the roots. It seemed to be an attack upon the foliage of the tree more than otherwise. There is a remedy in a case of that kind; chestnut trees, of course, sprout up from the roots. It seems to me some provision for the destruction or taking down of a tree and cutting it up to be used for building or any other purpose would answer without any difficulty. If the trees are killed at the roots of course it presents a much more difficult problem. I did not know but that the Senator might have some information in regard to it.

Mr. LODGE. I have no special information in regard to it and I do not think the disease of the chestnut trees is very well understood now. It has appeared recently. I only know that it is killing trees very rapidly. As I have understood it, chiefly as expressed in the amendment, and as I have understood it from my own slight observation, the disease affects them through the bark; but the result is unquestioned. It is destroying all the chestnut trees pretty much through the Eastern and the Middle States.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 89, line 9, before the word "thousand," strike out "forty" and insert "eighty."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask whether Massachusetts has appropriated money out of the State fund? Pennsylvania has made very large appropriations, and I think some of the other States have done so, to cooperate with the United States in eradicating this disease.

Mr. LODGE. The Massachusetts Legislature has, I think, appropriated for it. Our chestnut trees in Massachusetts are not at all as numerous as they are farther to the West and the South. The State has spent a great deal of money in the preservation of its trees. The amendment, however, requires cooperation with the States.

Mr. BACON. I do not know that it is very important to state, but the Senator said that this is a recent matter. I wish to state in this connection that in my part of the country it is not a recent matter. I can recollect when I was a schoolboy the whole of what we know in my State as middle Georgia was almost one vast forest of chestnut trees. Of course there were places where there were oak and hickory and trees of that kind, but generally throughout that section there were large forests of chestnut trees. There is now scarcely one left. That was a good many years ago; it was before the Civil War. I think it was the most general tree to be found in all that section of country. I recollect it distinctly when I was a schoolboy and a good many incidents therewith.

Mr. LODGE. When I said recent I meant the ravages of the disease, which in the last few years have excited general alarm through the Eastern and Middle States lest all the trees should be destroyed.

Mr. BACON. I will state to the Senator that while I have no technical knowledge on the subject of the general question throughout the country, they had then reached a certain period in the evolution of that species of vegetation when the time had come for them to disappear.

Mr. LODGE. That is possible.

Mr. BACON. There did not seem to be any very specific disease.

Mr. OLIVER. I hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts will prevail, and I suggest that more than $20,000 of this money be made immediately available.

Mr. President, this is a pest from which we are suffering particularly in the State of Pennsylvania, and it is rapidly spreading to other States. Resolutions upon the subject have been passed by the State Board of Agriculture, the State Grange, by the Forestry Association, and by other bodies of the State of Pennsylvania. The resolutions adopted by the Forestry Association are particularly applicable. I will suggest that the State of Pennsylvania itself has appropriated $275,000, which is now being used by a commission for the particular purpose of investigating this blight. I ask that the Secretary read the resolutions of the Pennsylvania Forestry Association, to which I have referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE PENNSYLVANIA FORESTRY ASSOCIATION,
Philadelphia, Pa., December 20, 1911.

Hon. GEORGE T. OLIVER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I wish to call your attention to resolutions passed by the Pennsylvania Forestry Association at their annual meeting on December 11, 1911, as follows:

"Whereas the chestnut-tree blight has caused a loss to the Nation estimated at $25,000,000 and threatens the destruction of the chestnut forests of the country; and

"Whereas there is great need for further investigation into the habits, distribution, and methods of control of the chestnut blight fungus in this and adjoining States:

"Resolved, That the Pennsylvania Forestry Association strongly urges the Pennsylvania delegation in Congress to support the bill which has been introduced into both Houses appropriating $80,000 for the use of the United States Department of Agriculture in investigating the chestnut blight."

It is hoped that you will support this bill. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania appropriated $275,000 to be used in combating this disease, and every possible means is being employed to check the further spread of the blight. This is a national problem, however, since the blight has appeared in Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, New York, and most of the New England States, and the assistance and cooperation of the National Government would be most acceptable.

Very respectfully,

F. L. BITLER, Recording Secretary.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I rise to advocate the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. This blight is very extensive. It is very rapid and destructive in its methods. The Legislature of Virginia has made an appropriation to cooperate with the Federal Government in this matter. I do not think that in the preservation of our forests this Government can afford to be parsimonious. One of the most important matters in connection with the wealth of this Nation is the preservation of its forests. Not only on account of the value of the timber, not only on account of the protection and benefit it gives to watersheds and rivers and the prevention of devastation caused by overflows, but the considerations of beauty and many other considerations induce me to conclude that this should not be a parsimonious appropriation.

It would seem to me that the Federal Government could very easily afford to appropriate the amount named by the Senator from Massachusetts. If these trees are to be saved it should be done quickly and promptly. Large forests and large trees are being rapidly destroyed. We have not ascertained the cause of the blight. Experiments have been made in a desultory way, but no scientific investigation has yet been made as to the means to arrest this blight. I hope the chairman of the committee will agree to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I desire simply to say that I heartily indorse the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. In my own experience, this blight has been most destructive. It is not confined to young trees, but trees that I know to be 50 years old have been attacked and destroyed by it.

In answer to the suggestion made by the Senator from Idaho, I will say the roots of the trees are not usually left alive—only in exceedingly rare instances are the roots left intact—but I can cite the cases of trees 20 inches and more in diameter whose roots as well as trunks and branches are dead from this cause.

To us in New Jersey the chestnut tree is the most valuable timber we have. It is not only used for general building and fencing purposes, but it is used for interior finishing. Almost any appropriation within reasonable bounds would be wise on the part of the United States Government to attempt to stay the destruction by this blight.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, so far as I have any authority to do so, I shall be very glad to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. I wish to add, in support thereof, the closing words of the report of the chief of the bureau, Dr. Galloway, to the Secretary of Agriculture, in which he says:

> In view of the immense value of the chestnut forests of the United States, estimated at from $300,000,000 to $400,000,000, and the wide territory already affected by the disease, which has caused damage to the extent of at least $25,000,000, we believe that the amount proposed to be appropriated—
> That is, $80,000—
> is none too large.

I hope the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER. On page 89, line 20, I move to strike out the word "twenty" and to insert "thirty."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 89, line 20, in the amendment of the committee, after the word "sum," it is proposed to strike out "twenty" and to insert "thirty," so as to read:

> Of which sum $30,000 shall be immediately available.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 90, after line 6, to insert:

> To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain an agricultural experiment station near Jerome, Lincoln County, Idaho, on Government land, for the irrigation of which water will be furnished free of charge as long as the land is used by the Government for experimenting in the cultivation, acclimating, and development of the most nutritious and productive types of potatoes, and for the purpose of experimentation and development of American sugar-beet seed adapted to the irrigated lands of the arid West, and for the erection of the necessary buildings, the preparation and distribution of reports and bulletins, and other necessary expenses, $10,000.

The next amendment was, on page 90, after line 18, to insert:

> Hereafter so much of the act of May 26, 1910 (36 Stat., p. 416); as requires the Secretary of Agriculture to transmit annually to the Secretary of the Treasury, for submission to Congress, detailed estimates for executive officers, clerks, and other employees in the various bureaus, offices, and divisions of the Department of Agriculture shall not apply to such employees in the meat-inspection service or employees engaged in the enforcement of the insecticide act of 1910.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I was on the committee which reported this bill, but I do not remember the reasons given by the Secretary of Agriculture for the amendment, and I should like to know what he said about it.

Mr. BURNHAM. I think the understanding of the committee was that we should communicate with the Secretary of Agriculture and get a definite answer with reference to this amendment; and the Secretary's answer states:

> I return herewith proposed draft of amendment with my approval. I suggest a change in it as submitted herewith.

That change has been made. So that the Secretary of Agriculture has approved the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, can the Senator in charge of the bill tell why these particular employees should be excepted from the general provision of the law?

Mr. BURNHAM. As I understand, this provision is intended so that the meat-inspection and insecticide acts shall go on; that each of those branches shall take care of its own expenses.

Mr. WARREN. If those employees come up under the regular statutory roll for general appropriation, it would still leave the $3,000,000 intact. The proposition is to take out of the $3,000,000—which is the annual appropriation made year after year and made so by the terms of the original act—the pay of all of the employees thereunder; and each year there is reported to Congress the amount paid out, and so forth. It is hard to estimate the expenditure beforehand, and of course you can hardly estimate for individuals that are employed only by the day as the emergency arises. This is rather in the line of economy than otherwise, because it prevents any money being used in the payment of men working under this three-million-dollar appropriation.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand that this exception does not include the regular employees of the department.

Mr. WARREN. Not at all.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But it only includes those employed from time to time as the occasion demands.

Mr. WARREN. Those that are payable under the three-million-dollar appropriation whether they are employed by the year or otherwise.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I still can not understand why they should not be estimated for the same as are any other employees.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I can not but believe that that provision ought not to be inserted in this bill. The Inspection Bureau of the department is now undergoing an inspection. A charge is made—and there is some proof tending to show it—that there is not that publicity given to the service that ought to be given to it. It seems to me that in inserting this clause in the proposed law we are doing away with some of the publicity, at least, that now exists under the law as it is to-day. I hate to object and make the point of order that the amendment is new legislation, but I should really like to have a better explanation than has been given for excepting this particular class of employees from the statute.

Mr. WARREN. I will admit that I may have made a poor explanation, but I will state that here are $3,000,000 a year appropriated, in terms providing for all expenses. Under that appropriation the employment of the men and all expenses come out of the $3,000,000. In the insecticide act there is another appropriation of what we call a lump fund. We provide there that that sum shall be all that shall be used for that purpose. Now, if you paid upon a statutory roll, they would have to come up as regular employees of the department in an estimate to the Treasury Department, and their pay would come out of the regular fund. The only way that this service could be estimated for in advance would be for the Secretary of Agriculture to presume upon what he may want, estimate the salaries of the men, take that estimate to the Secretary of the Treasury, and have him submit the estimate for them to Congress, as payable out of a special fund, but even then without some legislation it could not be advantageously done.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I want to inquire of the Senator from Wyoming whether or not he is referring to the $3,000,000 fund in connection with the entire service, or whether he is referring to the $3,000,000 fund in regard to the Forest Service?

Mr. WARREN. No; not the Forest Service at all. The $3,000,000 is for the inspection of meat.

There is another sum, that we passed a while ago, that applies to the specific laws as to insecticides and fungicides. That is intended to be a round sum, out of which the Secretary of Agriculture provides for all expenses. We have provided otherwise here, as near as we can, for the publicity to which my colleague alludes, and which it is very proper to keep in view:

That hereafter as much of—

And so forth.

Mr. HEYBURN. From what page does the Senator read?

Mr. WARREN. I am now referring to page 90. I think I have it here. If not, I shall find it somewhere else. That is to say, the Secretary of Agriculture each year renders specifically his account, showing every man he has employed and the money he receives; so that the publicity part of it exceeds the degree of publicity that it would receive if they were carried in the classified service. To estimate beforehand for the sums that may be expended would be extremely difficult. So long, however, as we make it obligatory that all of the clerks and employees shall be paid out of that sum, we keep it separate in the manner that is provided here.

Mr. HEYBURN. My attention was drawn to the following statement on pages 170 and 171 of the Statement of Expenditures, Department of Agriculture, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911:

Total amount of appropriation	$3,000,000.00
Total expenditures under above groups	2,861,587.16
Unexpended balance on Aug. 31, 1911	138,412.84
Balance to be turned back in Treasury (estimated)	121,264.05

That all deals with the $3,000,000 appropriation. It appears that there is a balance to be returned to the Treasury out of that appropriation. That is true of other schedules, if I may term them such, and it is true in the Forest Service, that there is a large balance to be turned back into the Treasury.

Mr. WARREN. I do not want to presume as to what the Senator may have in mind, but if there is a balance it goes back to the Treasury, of course.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then why should we reappropriate a sum in excess of the conceded necessities? That $3,000,000 appropriation is not a sacred appropriation. Every Congress may, of course, deal with any law that exists on the statute books. We are about to appropriate more than the amount necessary to meet the expenses of the service indicated.

Mr. WARREN. But at other times the full amount has been used, and they have even been short. It happened that they had a balance last year. They were able to get through with less than the amount appropriated; but that is not, I think, a sufficient warrant for us to repeal the statute as it stands—providing for the annual appropriation of $3,000,000. If we should renew the appropriation and this year there should be another surplus, and perhaps a larger one, and next year there should be again another, I would join with the Senator in an effort to reduce the annual appropriation, but so far the amount appropriated has been sometimes less and sometimes more than was needed, and I think oftener less than more. I speak without my notes, of course, before me, but that is my remembrance of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is one place in the statement of expenditures where it is stated that there is $1,800,000 to be turned back. Ought not these sums—I suppose they will be turned back——

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator stop right there a moment? I know to what he refers. He refers to the million dollars, I assume, appropriated as an emergency fund for forest fires.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I do not refer to that particularly.

Mr. WARREN. A large part of that amount has been turned back to the Treasury.

Mr. HEYBURN. I had it a moment ago——

Mr. WARREN. I will say that that question will come up, and perhaps I ought to say that a year or two years ago we had——

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator will find it on page 771:

Balance to be turned back in Treasury (estimated), $1,814,631.70.

Mr. WARREN. I have not that before me. From what fund was that?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is under the Forest Service.

Mr. WARREN. Yes. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I am only citing that for the purpose of inquiring whether the Senator has information as to whether or not these sums will be turned back into the Treasury before or at the end of the fiscal year and be available as a part of the money to meet our appropriation bills?

Mr. WARREN. At the end of each fiscal year the unused portion of the annual appropriation of $3,000,000 goes back into the Treasury for general use. The appropriation to which the Senator alludes occurred in this way: We had, the year before, an emergency which justified the use of money without an express appropriation, under the emergency clause.

Mr. HEYBURN. We may think we had, but we violated the Constitution when we undertook to do it.

Mr. WARREN. That may be so, but the whole procedure of the Government is based upon that emergency clause. In case of war or in case of a great forest fire it has always been made use of and probably always will be. We had fires that cost some seven or eight hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HEYBURN. Where?

Mr. WARREN. All over the country, particularly in the Northwest.

Mr. HEYBURN. All right. I will discuss, when I come to it, the cost of those fires.

Mr. WARREN. Very well. The Secretary came to Congress and, after his presentation of the case, got $750,000 in a deficiency bill to cover the expenditure, and no voice was raised against it. In the next year the Congress saw fit, in view of that emergency, to place a million dollars at the disposal of the Secretary of Agriculture for emergency purposes. He used only about $22,000 of it and the balance went back into the Treasury. That is the large sum to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a fine illustration of what I have contended for here. A lot of exaggerated newspaper statements and pictures of whole communities burning up came to the attention of Congress. Congress immediately took the words of the sensational reporters that there were millions of dollars worth of property being destroyed, and it turned out that it was about the cost of one good stock farm.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator claim that the fires of two years ago, during the continuance of which a portion of the Army was called out to aid in suppressing them, were "one-stock-farm" fires?

Mr. HEYBURN. I was on the ground and saw those fires. I know something about them and may, if I find occasion, tell something about them.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator did not tell us about them when we appropriated $750,000 in a deficiency bill to cover the expenditure.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will refer to the RECORD, his memory will be refreshed as to what I said then. I may take chances on repeating myself to-morrow.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator will refer to the RECORD of which he speaks to refresh his own memory. I think it justifies the confidence reposed in the officers of the Department of Agriculture that with that large sum at their disposal—a million dollars for that purpose—they expended only $22,000 and turned the rest back into the Treasury.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am sorry it was not all turned back. I am sorry that they were compelled to spend any of it, because all loss and destruction is deplorable.

Mr. WARREN. So am I. I am very sorry.

Mr. HEYBURN. But we are now dealing with the Treasury of the United States, and we do not want to deal with it recklessly.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator wish to cut down the $3,000,000 a year for the inspection of meat?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I do not know that I want to cut that down. I am going to consider those questions. I rose principally to establish the status of this $3,000,000 appropriation. The Senator from Wyoming had, as I understood him, spoken of it as a fund that we have no control over, as an appropriation that had been made, and was a continuing appropriation. I do not so understand.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, however the Senator understands it, we appropriated it in this way, that hereafter annually there should be paid so much, just like the amount under the Hatch and Morrill Acts that go to the agricultural colleges. It is true that we could amend the law; it is true that we could change the law; but there is that much appropriated and provided for exactly the same as a quite large class of other standing annual appropriations.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the distinction is obvious between the Morrill Act appropriation and this appropriation. That act was made for the establishment and maintenance of educational institutions. This is simply for the current expenses of the Government, and, under the law, we are bound to observe the necessities and confine the appropriations within the limit of the necessities. When it is demonstrated, as it is year after year, that $3,000,000 is not needed and that $1,000,000 is sufficient, would we be held to appropriate $3,000,000, not for some private institution or the advancement of some science but for the payment of expenses? The payment of expenses is a very definite proposition; expenses exist only to the extent that they exist.

I wanted to call attention to the $3,000,000 item in the Bureau of Animal Industry. I shall probably, when we reach the reserved paragraphs of the bill, call attention to the $3,000,000 appropriation in the Forestry Service, as well as to the $1,000,000 appropriation for the protection of timberlands against fire, but I only rose on this occasion to discuss the $3,000,000 claimed to be an obligatory appropriation upon Congress for the Bureau of Animal Industry.

Mr. WARREN. And it is so until repealed.

Mr. HEYBURN. But if we fail to appropriate it, it is repealed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The totals will be changed to correspond with the amendments after the bill shall have been completed.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if that completes the committee amendments I desire to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it the desire at the present time to go back and take up the items that were passed over?

Mr. SWANSON. It seems to me——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I desire to offer to a committee amendment, on page 2, and I will ask leave to return to that page for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah offers an amendment to a committee amendment. If there be no objection, the amendment to the amendment will be entertained now.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, I will say that there is no objection to that course so far as the committee is concerned.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 14, before the word "law," it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out "three" and inserting "one," and after the word "law" by inserting the words "clerk, at $3,000; 2," so as to read:

One law clerk, at $3,000; 2 law clerks, at $2,500 each.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The purpose of that amendment, Mr. President, is to pay to the law clerk who acts as Solicitor in the absence of the Solicitor $3,000 instead of $2,500 per annum. I will say to the Senate that the employees holding similar positions in the Department of Commerce and Labor, in the Treasury Department, in the Interior Department, and in the State Department receive that amount.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that the amendment be stated again. I did not understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will again be stated.

The Secretary again stated the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think that is a mistake, and I hope the Senate will not agree to it. The recommendation of the Secretary is that there should be three of these clerks. He has shown the necessity for them, and I do not think we ought to change the number back to one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that it does not change the number, but increases the salary of one of the clerks.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well. I understood that the amendment would restore the text of the House bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It provides for one law clerk at $3,000 and two law clerks at $2,500.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is correct.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to offer an amendment. On page 70, line 8, I move to strike out "two" and insert "five." I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the amendment.

Mr. BURNHAM. I have no objection, so far as I have power, to accepting the amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. In line 11, page 70, I should like to state to the committee and also to the Senate that the foreman of this Bureau of Distribution now gets $1,200.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Is the Senator correct in stating the place?

Mr. SWANSON. Page 70, line 8. The amendment proposes to pay the foreman of the Farmers' Bulletin distribution exactly the same salary as is paid to the foreman of the miscellaneous distribution. That is $1,500. Now, under the bill here the forewoman under the foreman gets $1,400; another forewoman gets $1,200.

It seems to me that this man, who has been there a long time, foreman of this division, should be paid the same salary that is paid the foremen of other divisions which have less work.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 70, line 8, strike out "two" and insert "five," so as to read:

One foreman, Farmers' Bulletin distribution, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I rise to a point of order. I supposed the committee amendments were all to be disposed of before individual amendments were considered.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I thought the committee amendments had been considered.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No.

Mr. WARREN. There were quite a large number which we passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Committee amendments will be considered at the present time.

Mr. WARREN. I suggest that we turn to page 65. I notice that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] is in his place.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to inquire of the Chair when it will be in order for me to present the amendment? If the bill is passed, I can not amend it. I will say that I have submitted my amendment to the chairman of the committee, and it meets with his approbation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that as soon as the committee amendments are disposed of—those in the bill—the Senator will be recognized.

Mr. SWANSON. It seems to me we agreed that certain parts of the bill should be passed over. Now that we have considered the other committee amendments, it seems to me we should first proceed to perfect those amendments in the bill which have not been considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Consideration of the committee amendments passed over can be demanded at any time, and it is now demanded, and the first amendment which has been passed over will be stated.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask the Senate to recur to the amendment passed over at my request on page 25.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the amendments passed over ought to be taken up in order. The first amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 28, relative to the Forest Service.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask the chairman in charge of the bill if he desires to complete the bill to-night? There is going to be some extended discussion upon that portion of the bill which relates to the Forest Service. I should prefer to discuss it to-morrow, and yet if it is the desire of the Senator to go ahead I will not inconvenience him.

Mr. BURNHAM. Of course, I would be very glad to get through with the bill to-night, but if there is going to be any prolonged discussion I should like to see it completed, with the exception of the forestry matters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendments relating to the Forest Service will be passed over for the present, and the next amendment passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is, on page 53, to insert at the top of the page——

Mr. HEYBURN. That belongs to the Forest Service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be passed over.

Mr. NELSON. Has that amendment been read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment goes over as being a part of the Forest Service appropriation.

The SECRETARY. The next paragraph passed over is, on page 55, relative to "General expenses, Bureau of Chemistry."

Mr. HEYBURN. That was passed over because of the unusual and ambiguous language in which the section is clothed.

Mr. WARREN. Is that the one regarding the Marsh test?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will read it, and perhaps the committee will undertake its revamping.

On page 55, commencing in line 18, it reads:

General expenses, Bureau of Chemistry: For necessary expenses in conducting the investigations contemplated by the act of May 15, 1862, relating to the application of chemistry to agriculture.

Now, this is the language that is unusual:

In the most general and comprehensive sense of that word, and to continue collaboration with other departments of the Government desiring chemical investigations and whose heads request the Secretary of Agriculture for such assistance, and for other miscellaneous work, as follows.

Mr. President, I think that preamble should be stricken out, and we might begin with the words "for chemical apparatus," which occur on the next page. No legislation should be clothed in any such language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho make a motion?

Mr. BURNHAM. What amendment does the Senator suggest?

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest striking out all of it down to line 3, on page 55, and then enumerating what you propose to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho make that motion?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 55, after the heading in line 18, strike out down to and including line 2, on page 56, as follows:

For necessary expenses in conducting the investigations contemplated by the act of May 15, 1862, relating to the application of chemistry to agriculture in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word, and to continue collaboration with other departments of the Government desiring chemical investigations and whose heads request the Secretary of Agriculture for such assistance, and for other miscellaneous work, as follows.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next passed over amendment is relative to the Wind Cave Reservation.

Mr. WARREN. I beg pardon. There is an amendment on page 57 that was passed by. The Senator from Idaho wished some information about it. I have the correspondence here.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would be very glad to be informed. It is an unusual proceeding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will first be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 57, after the word "dollars," in line 13, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That of this sum the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend not exceeding $5,000 for the purchase of all right, title, and interest in and to the Marsh test for detecting artificial coloring matter in whisky, the same being covered by letters patent 813,728, which payment shall include full satisfaction for any and all use that may have heretofore been made of the said process by the United States.

Mr. WARREN. The House committee passed this amendment and put it in the bill, but under the rules of the House it was stricken out. The President sent some correspondence here, or directed Mr. Hilles to forward it. I will send it to the desk that it may be read.

It seems that this test has already been used more or less by the Government, and it is desirous of obtaining the right to use it, and the amount stated is not only for the use of it hereafter, but to settle for any use of it made heretofore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

CINCINNATI, April 5, 1912.

His Excellency WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT,
President of the United States, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In my letter to you of December 11, 1909, I referred to you for your consideration the question of compensation by the Federal Government for the use of the process of Letters Patent No. 813,728, owned by Messrs. Alfred C. Marsh and Louis H. Weissleder, and popularly known as the "Marsh test."

You thereupon appointed a special committee for investigation of the matter, this committee consisting of representatives from the Treasury Department, the Department of Agriculture, and the Department of Justice.

This committee reported favorably and recommended the payment of $5,000 for the patent, and the recommendation of the committee was approved by the solicitor and Secretary of the Department of Agriculture and by the principal officials of the Treasury Department and Department of Justice, and you indorsed the report, "I favor this purchase if authority exists to carry it out."

The Department of Justice concluded that it was best to present the matter of payment to Congress, and this has been done in the form of a proviso in Agricultural bill (H. R. 18960), this proviso being found on page 56 of that bill in the following language:

"Provided, That of this sum the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend not exceeding $5,000 for the purchase of all right, title, and interest in and to the Marsh test for detecting artificial coloring matter in whisky, the same being covered by Letters Patent 813728, which payment shall include full satisfaction for any and all use that may have heretofore been made of the said proceed by the United States."

In Report No. 271 accompanying this bill the House Committee on Agriculture, Mr. LAMB, chairman, on page 5 of the report, commented on this proviso as follows:

"This new language has been added at the request of the Attorney General, and the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry states that it is the best test for artificial coloring in liquors of any kind, and the department has been using this patented test without compensation to the patentee."

I was in hope that with all these favorable recommendations there would be no further delay in obtaining payment to the owners of the patent, but I notice from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 11 last that this proviso went out on a point of order.

From the circumstances in connection with the matter I am convinced that it did not go out on any consideration whatever of the merits; in fact, the merits were not given any consideration on the floor of the House, but that the time reserved for the consideration of this agricultural bill in the House had practically been consumed when the proviso was reached, and that the House desired time for the consideration of other matters in the bill, and that in order to save time this proviso was simply stricken out, as will appear from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the issue of Monday, March 11, last.

The agricultural bill as passed by the House has been sent to the Senate, and I presume has been referred to the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, of which Mr. HENRY F. LIPPITT, of Rhode Island, is chairman.

It is with some hesitancy that I approach you on the subject, as the matter is now in the legislative branch of the Government, but I wish to advise you of the present status of the matter, to see whether something can not be done to expedite compensation to the owners of the patent.

It does not seem to me that the Government ought to be placing itself in the position of knowingly using the process of the patent and to gain the enormous benefits it has from this process, and fail to promptly make the comparatively small payment mentioned in this case, especially as the thorough investigation of the matter by all the departments resulted in unanimous recommendation in favor of the purchase by every official who has given the matter consideration. The claim is not one where the owners of the patent have insisted on an exorbitant payment, or even on a payment which to them appears commensurate with the benefits derived by the Government, but have readily agreed to the recommendations of the committee.

While viewed in a certain light, the matter is now before the legislative branch of the Government, it would seem to be not exclusively so, for it concerns a very important tool of the Government, and it is a tool that is required by the departments mentioned, and has been and is being used by them very extensively. The executive branch is at all times perfectly justified in insisting upon the legislative branch providing it with the necessary tools to transact its business.

I hope that some action can be taken so that the real situation and the real merits of the case and the smallness of the compensation asked can be brought home to Congress, so that this matter may be disposed of and the owners of the patent promptly paid for the same.

Prompt action should be taken for the reason that the Senate committee is now giving the agricultural bill consideration and is about to report.

Appreciating anything that the executive branch of the Government can do in this matter, I am,

Respectfully,

A. F. HERBSLEB.

Concurred in by me:

JOHN ELIAS JONES,
On behalf of A. C. Marsh.

Mr. BORAH. I was not able to follow the reading very well, and I do not know what the Government wants with this test. What does the Government want to buy it for? For what use?

Mr. WARREN. I do not suppose the Government is going into the whisky question as a business, but in the pure food and drugs act and in the general consideration that the Government is giving to pure food and drink the departments have been called upon, as Senators know, to ascertain the quality of whisky; and I know it has been a question "What is whisky?" This is one of the tests that has been used.

Mr. BORAH. It ought to be determined by the experts. Has the Government been using this test right along?

Mr. WARREN. It has to some extent; I do not know how extensively.

Mr. BORAH. Is there any reason why the Government should not use it right along?

Mr. WARREN. Well, there is perhaps no reason why the Government, as it is strong enough, should not enter the house of the Senator, or mine, and take anything it sees fit, but when a man has a patent and has rights the Government should not invade them.

Mr. BORAH. Is that true?

Mr. WARREN. That is true. This is to buy for the Government that patent.

Mr. BORAH. If a patent runs against the Government, upon what theory has it been using this test?

Mr. WARREN. As a matter of accommodation, I presume. The Government has repeatedly used patents without authority, and we have had large bills in the Claims Committee and the Military Affairs and other committees to compensate for such use, and we have paid large amounts for such use.

The Government sometimes finds itself under the necessity of using a patent without arrangements for its use, and it uses it bodily and forcibly and settles afterwards. Moreover, a patentee often wants to have the Government use his device in order that he may have the Government pass upon its efficiency, and later on the Government, if it finds it satisfactory, makes compensation.

This is a matter of no moment to the committee and certainly is none to me, but it is sent up from the Executive Office for the consideration of the committee and is indorsed by the executive department.

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me this patent can not be valid, for the reason that I remember when we had the pure-food law here printed circulars were handed around from various manufacturers showing how to color whisky, how to blend it, how to age it. Formulas were given how to make 10-year-old whisky, how to make 15-year-old whisky, how to color it, and how to age it, and all those things. So it is no longer a secret, and I do not see the occasion, in view of what transpired at that time, to buy this obsolete patent.

Mr. WARREN. It is not a patent to make whisky, but it is a test to enable the Government to detect in whisky artificial coloring matter, and so forth.

Mr. NELSON. We can all test it. It does not require any patented machine or apparatus to determine what whisky is. I can always tell by a man's breath whether it was a blend or a straight whisky.

Mr. WARREN. I wish at this time to testify that the country would like to purify the breath of those who take whisky, and the odor of whisky itself, and would like to see something done about it; but if the Senator thinks each one should pass upon his own whisky we might apply that to food, and say we have entirely too much legislation with respect to what we ought to eat and drink otherwise.

Mr. BORAH. I raised my objection in good faith. I do not understand why the Government should enter upon this principle, either from a legal or a moral standpoint; but I shall not object to its consideration to-night. However, if the bill is to go over, I should like to have this item go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to have the Senator apprised as to the correspondence. There is no letter from the President recommending that we acquire this patent. The President does not express any view, one way or the other.

Mr. WARREN. I did not claim that the letter was from the President.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was not charging the Senator with that.

Mr. WARREN. A part of the papers the Senator has there are private papers, in nowise pertaining to the so-called Marsh test, and I did not expect to have them read.

Mr. HEYBURN. That puts a different phase on it. I will hand them back to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. It is only this one [indicating]. These [indicating] are all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please address the Chair and get permission to interrupt.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will invite the attention of the Senate for a moment to the letter which has been read inasmuch as the Senator says he has no objection.

Mr. WARREN. I account for its being addressed to me by the fact that I had charge of the last Agriculture appropriation bill before this one. For that reason, I assume, it was addressed to me.

Mr. HEYBURN. The letter is addressed to the Senator from Wyoming, and I call the attention of my colleague to it:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, April 8, 1912.

MY DEAR SENATOR WARREN: I send you herewith, by direction of the President, a letter which he has received from A. F. Herbsleb, of Cincinnati, Ohio, concerning the claim of Alfred C. Marsh and Louis H. Weissleder.

Sincerely, yours,
CHARLES D. HILLES,
Secretary to the President.

Hon. F. E. WARREN, United States Senate.

He does not say that he believes it to be true or untrue, and it is only fair to say that the letter inclosed is from an attorney and counselor at law in Cincinnati—I presume one of the attorneys of the whisky men.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator ought not to assume that I am undertaking to deceive him or the Senate in any way.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not assuming that the Senator would do that in any way.

Mr. WARREN. The letter came from the executive department for investigation by the committee, and when the Secretary of Agriculture came before the committee he brought up the matter and recommended it. It went in the bill on the House side, but went out on a point of order, and the Secretary asked us to insert it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey Mr. President, I will say—not in the sense of a man experienced in the matter of the color of whisky—that it seems to me the amendment involves a sheer waste. It would seem to me that an examination as to whether liquor was pure or not would establish well enough whether there was coloring matter in it or not. And, pray God, what difference is there if there is a little coloring matter in it? What difference does it make, if the whisky is good—and generally whisky is pronounced good.

To those of the Senate who may be in doubt as to the color of whisky, I say: Come to the glorious Commonwealth of New Jersey, where they brew rivers of an elixir known as applejack. Whether colored or otherwise, it is rich in aroma, delirious as an intoxicant, promoting happiness, health, and longevity. This being so, I hold it to be a crime to squander the people's money only to establish a color. Why, Mr. President, after a couple of drinks of New Jersey liquor they would not be able to detect that there were colors in a rainbow. But, Mr. President, dismiss this question, and on the adjournment I invite you to come to New Jersey and see, taste, and test for yourself. Come!

Mr. BORAH. I desire to know what the Government wants with it?

Mr. WARREN. Before the work was over this board was appointed, as stated in the letter, by the executive department, consisting of a representative of the Department of Justice and the Department of Agriculture and the Treasury Department. They reported in favor of this test, and it was indorsed by this department, and the department has asked for it. It is an easy matter to dispose of if there is any opposition to it.

Mr. BORAH. Who were the committee?

Mr. WARREN. The members of the committee are not named, but the committee consisted of representatives from the Treasury Department, the Agricultural Department, and the Department of Justice.

Mr. BORAH. If the matter was properly examined by a committee that did not represent the interests of those who desire to sell the patent, it would be, of course, worthy of consideration, but we have not anything before us now, as I understand the reading of the letter, except the correspondence from some one who desires to sell this test.

Mr. WARREN. We have the letter of those who called attention to the fact that it was laid before the President; that the President had appointed a committee of representatives from these three departments; that these three departments recommended the purchase of it, for the Agricultural Department; and that the Agricultural Department recommended it to Congress. It went in the bill on the House side, and some one had it stricken out on the floor on a point of order, and we have introduced it here.

Mr. BORAH. Has the Senator there the recommendation of the committee and the ground for the recommendation?

Mr. WARREN. Here?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I have not.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I want to see. But if the Senator desires to vote on it, I will agree to a vote on it.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is one thing that should be made clear. A suggestion was made, I think by the Senator from Wyoming, that the question as to what was whisky had been considered and much attention given to it by the department, and that that was evidence tending to show that the department had occasion to deal with this question.

They have just as much occasion to deal with this question as with the question, "What is whisky?" It was purely voluntary action on their part. There is no legal function that they are called upon to perform that made it necessary to enter into a consideration of what was whisky, because that is a question which has to be settled by the court, involving the question as to whether or not it is whisky.

But some of those who were engaged in that overleaping of the limits of jurisdiction, failing to distinguish between the Department of Justice and the Department of Agriculture, entered upon the consideration of a moot question as to what was whisky. That affords no ground whatever for the adoption of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The SECRETARY. The next passed over amendment is on page 65, after line 17, to insert:

For the establishment of a national game preserve, to be known as the Wind Cave National Game Preserve, upon the lands embraced within the boundaries of the Wind Cave National Park, in the State of South Dakota, for a permanent national range for a herd of bison to be presented to the United States by the American Bison Society, and for such other native American animals as may be placed therein. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to acquire by purchase or condemnation such other lands as may be necessary for the purpose of assuring an adequate, permanent water supply at a cost not exceeding the sum of $15,000, which amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the said purpose, is hereby appropriated. There is hereby further appropriated the sum of $17,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to inclose the said game preserve with a good and substantial fence and to erect thereon all necessary sheds and buildings for the proper care and maintenance of the said animals; in all, the sum of $32,000, to be available until expended.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I asked that these amendments be passed over because I was not quite familiar with their provisions. To the establishment of a national game preserve for the protection of bison I have no objection, but on line 24 of page 65 it provides:

For such other native American animals as may be placed therein.

I do not know whether it is the intention to have the Government go into the business of stock raising or not. We hear a great deal said against the Government ownership of railroads and other public utilities. Now, it may be that it is all right for the Government to engage in stock raising. There seems to be no objection to that.

The information I desire to get from the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] is this: The amendment authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to acquire this land by condemnation, and so forth. I should like to know how much of this land is proposed to be purchased by the Agricultural Department for this game preserve.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Government has at this time 10,500 acres of land in the Black Hills known as the Wind Cave National Game Preserve. It belongs to the Government. The cave is a curiosity which is frequented by visitors. The large tract of land is lying there idle. The American Bison Society, of which Mr. Hornaday is chairman, has for a number of years been raising and protecting what few specimens we have left of the American bison. This society made application to the Government to make some arrangement by which it could turn over to the Government to be kept in this reservation as pasture some 15 native American bison. The representative of that society went out there, looked over the reservation, and reported that it was very suitable for the purpose, save and except to make it a success it was necessary to get a small tract of land adjacent to this large tract of 10,500 acres in which there was a natural flow of water the year around which these animals would have access to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Just let me finish this statement. Dr. Palmer, of the Department of Agriculture, came before the committee and said they had received information as to the price at which they could secure 400 acres of land adjacent to the reservation in which there was water, giving the figure at which the 400 acres of land containing the water could be secured, namely, $15,000.

Now, as a business transaction, if we have a tract of 10,500 acres of land without water and can secure adjacent to it a tract of 400 acres of land with water sufficient to water the animals that are to be kept on it, it is a very good proposition on the part of the Government to secure that 400 acres of land. The only expense involved is $15,000 for the purpose of purchasing this small tract of 400 acres adjacent to the large tract of 10,500 acres for the purpose of getting water. The other item is for fencing the reservation, in order that these animals may be placed there. There are 15 of the bison in possession of the American Bison Society, which they propose to put into this pasture. The expense of the bison is nothing to the Government at all. The other refers to other animals and has relation simply to the elk. There was a proposition also to put some elk in this pasture. I will say to my good friend the Senator from North Dakota that I do not think the keeping of 15 or 25 head of native buffalo and a few large elk in the pasture will in any way jeopardize the land-holding industry of the United States.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will allow me, I want to strike out the word "animals" and insert in lieu the word "elk." Would the Senator have any objection to that amendment?

Mr. CRAWFORD. None whatever. I am not responsible for the use of the words in the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GRONNA. I move as an amendment that the word "animals" be stricken out and the word "elk" inserted.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will allow the amendment to be stated?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

The SECRETARY. On page 65, line 24, after the word "American," strike out "animals" and insert "elk."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the Senator desire to discuss the question?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; and to ask for some information.

There are now about 200,000,000 acres of land withdrawn in this country. I do not understand the necessity of this movement which is on foot to create forest game reserves in different parts of the Union in addition to the 200,000,000 acres of reserve lands which we have already.

There are several parks in which these bison are kept, and they can just as well be kept there as here where we are going to purchase this land. I do not understand the necessity of purchasing private land which ought to be in private ownership and not in public ownership, as we have such a vast amount of reserved land already. Neither do I understand the necessity of preserving upon the face of the earth these bison. What possible benefit can they be to anyone? They look just as well in photographs as they look in reality, and when they are gone the country and the world will be no worse off than before. What possible reason is there for preserving them? Does the Senator know of any?

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the Senator is expressing himself with cold matter of fact on the question of commercial value, I do not suppose there is any, but we have been in the habit, and I presume we will continue to be in the habit, whether it is a curious one or not, of indulging in things of this kind for their relation to natural history if for nothing else. While the native American bison is not a handsome animal, he has cut a very large figure in the history of the United States, and I do not think we want to have the species become extinct.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senators will yield to me, I will explain to them the great value and use of the buffalo. When I first came to Minnesota, in 1871, nearly every farmer and all the people I met had fur overcoats and they were of buffalo skin. They were the very best of overcoats. A farmer at that time could buy an ordinary fur overcoat for $16, and if it was silk lined you could get elegant coats for $25. I have worn them when the weather was 25 and 30 degrees below zero, and our people have to wear fur coats in such weather. Those coats were used by everybody.

They kept on slaughtering those bison. I remember one winter when a fellow came through our little town. He had four or five sled loads of buffalo skins. I bought a fine one for $4 and another one not quite as good for $3, and out of the two I had a fine overcoat made, that lasted me for years and years.

What have our farmers got to wear now? Most of their fur coats are of dogskin and other kinds of plunder. I should like to see the bison herds restored, so that all farmers could have the old-time buffalo overcoat that we used to wear in the old days in Minnesota. There is nothing, either for warmth, for protection, or for wear, equal to the overcoats made from buffalo skins. I hope to God we can have the buffalo herd restored, so that all the farmers in the northwestern country can have heavy buffalo robes and overcoats, as in the good old days before we had the initiative and referendum and the recall and all other fads.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I want to express hearty approval of the observations made by the Senator from Minnesota. When I was a boy in northern New York there was no farmer so poor that he could not have one or two buffalo robes for his sleigh. The American bison is an animal which affords the great advantage of furnishing a warm covering for winter and food at the same time. If he is raised and killed, both his skin and his meat are valuable. I think it very desirable if we can preserve this species and so stimulate the raising of buffalo.

May I make one suggestion as to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. ROOT. I think it would be unfortunate to leave the bill so that it will provide a range for a herd of bison "and other native American elk."

Mr. GRONNA. Does the Senator from New York know of any other animal that he thinks he would like to include?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I hope we will not strike out the word "animal." We might want to put in "'coon." In the old days they wore 'coon-skin caps with buffalo overcoats. Let us go back to the old days.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I have not yielded the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair begs the pardon of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. BORAH. I thought the Senator yielded when I said I wished to ask for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think the Senator from New York or the Senator from Minnesota expects that we shall ever have sufficient bison in this country to restore the overcoats at the price they were purchased in the old days. Of course, I presume that is a mere matter of pleasantry. This is a fad—nothing else in the world—and it will never amount to anything except to preserve a few of these animals to satisfy the taste of some of those who are engaged in this kind of work.

But even if we are going to raise these animals for the purpose of supplying overcoats, why not put them somewhere on the 200,000,000 acres we already have? Is there any reason why they will grow better fur or better skins on this particular scheme of the Senator from South Dakota than in the 200,000,000 acres scattered all over the United States? We are driving the settlers into Canada while we are endeavoring to raise buffalo in this country. I think it is better to give a chance for the common overcoat and the common citizen instead of having no citizen and having the buffalo.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish to inquire of the Senator whether he has considered the plan of promoting the cultivation of buffalo by a protective tariff on them as you do on sheep?

Mr. BORAH. This is a bounty, which is altogether better than a protective tariff.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, the fact is that this is a part of the 200,000,000 acres of land about which the Senator is talking. This 10,500 acres is a part of a forest reserve now, and it is a natural habitat of the bison. In the early days they lived there on the native pasture, and they can do so now. It involves no expense except to turn these animals into that pasture. If the water is furnished they can maintain themselves. The Government owns the land. It is a simple proposition of acquiring 400 acres additional for the water and putting fences around it, and the question is solved so far as these few head of native buffalo are concerned.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am in accord with the Senator in his desire to preserve the buffalo, but I suggest to him whether we have not already a fine buffalo range in the Yellowstone National Park, consisting of, I think, 2,000,000 acres of land. There is quite a large and, I understand, a thriving and growing herd of buffalo now taken care of there. They are looked after by the Government officials in that park.

Is this provision necessary in view of the fact that we have already established in the Yellowstone Park what you might call a buffalo reserve with ample range for them? I very much doubt whether 10,000 acres fenced in would protect the buffalo, but we have 2,000,000 acres in the Yellowstone National Park. I ask for information.

Mr. CRAWFORD. This is simply a little proposition for the preservation of 15 or 20 head of bison which the American Bison Society is interested in keeping alive. The remnants of the bison are offered to be given to the United States if the Government will furnish the pasture. They have examined this pasture and they find it suitable and desirable. They propose to turn these animals in there if the Government will simply put a fence around what is already a Government reservation and secure water on the small tract of 400 acres adjacent.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. My suggestion was drawn out by the fact that we have already practically a reservation which includes this among other purposes, and the question is whether we shall go to work and expend $30,000 or $40,000 now and incur a continuous expense to accomplish the same purpose.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not understand that there will be any expense in addition to the fencing.

Mr. BORAH. It will take several keepers to look after the buffalo.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not know about keepers.

Mr. BORAH. There will be one keeper for every buffalo inside of the next five years.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Apparently there is great fear in Idaho and Wyoming that we may infringe on their native game preserves if we have 15 or 25 head of buffalo put in a park in the Black Hills.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I resent the statement of the Senator from South Dakota. I asked a question which I think is reasonable.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will say to the Senator that I am not informed.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. We are considering a question of public expenditure. I did not make any statement as to my view. I asked the Senator what he thought of the Yellowstone National Park proposition.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not know about the number in any of the other forest reserves. I am not informed about that.

Mr. BORAH. I presume there can be no possible reason for separating these 15 head of bison from the other bison found in the United States unless there be some difference in the breed or something of that kind. If there is, perhaps there may be a reason for it.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, there are two good reasons. They need water for the buffalo. That is the object of getting the 400 additional acres of land. I can readily see that the Wind Cave will be a great shelter to the buffalo in winter. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask one more question. What kind of land is this 400 acres?

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is land very much like the rest, but it has water on it.

Mr. BORAH. Is it land fit for cultivation, fit for homes?

Mr. CRAWFORD. No, sir. That whole region is not adapted to the general purpose of farming, because it is on the plateau and has always been and probably always will be a range country rather than an agricultural country. It is naturally a range country where the native buffalo grass grows, and it is a natural habitat for the buffalo. It has not been devoted to small farming and probably never will be. It is a most natural region for these animals to prosper in. It is a pasturage.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I understand that the Government already owns the ten thousand and more acres.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It does.

Mr. SHIVELY. On the ten thousand and more acres there will be the food for the buffalo?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHIVELY. And Wind Cave will be a shelter for the buffalo?

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senator from Minnesota said so. I would not dispute the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIVELY. And all that is required is some additional land to furnish water for the buffalo?

Mr. CRAWFORD. There is some water near by, which they have an option on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from New York moves to strike out the word "other."

Mr. ROOT. No, sir.

Mr. GRONNA. I was going over this rather hurriedly. I will ask the Senator from South Dakota if he would have objection to the following amendment:

After the word "animals" add "such as moose, deer, and elk," and then leave the language as it is?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I suggest in place of striking that out, how would it do to insert "such other American game animals as may be placed there"?

Mr. GRONNA. Some claim that the buffalo is a domestic animal. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think that will cover the point the Senator is making.

Mr. GRONNA. I think my amendment would cover it if we add after the word "animals" the language, "such as moose, elk, or deer."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then the Senator would be satisfied with any kind of animals. I think the word "game" would evidently cover the point.

Mr. GRONNA. I will accept the language of the Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote inserting the word "elk" will be reconsidered. Will the Senator from South Carolina restate his amendment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. After the word "American" I move to insert the word "game."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "American," in line 24, on page 65, it is proposed to insert the word "game," so that it will read:

And for such other native American game animals as may be placed therein.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, when I asked that this amendment go over, it was for the purpose of moving to strike out the word "bison" and inserting "buffalo." The American people have always known that animal as a "buffalo," although scientifically it is known as a "bison." I move to strike out the word "bison" in line 22 and to insert the word "buffalo." Then everybody will known what we mean.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator mean where the society is named?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I do not care for the society. It may call itself by any name it pleases, but the animal we want legislatively to be a buffalo.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, that is the name of a society. You can not change the name of a society by an amendment to an appropriation bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not proposing to change the name of the society.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Idaho refers to the word "bison" in the line above, where the society is named.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I imagine we all understand what the meaning of the word is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 65, line 22, it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out the word "bison" and in lieu thereof inserting the word "buffalo."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it seems to me that the land where water is would be quite large enough for what number of buffalo—is it 12? The amendment uses the term "herd," but there is no particular number of animals that constitute a herd in law, and I should like to know what the number is. Some Senator mentioned the number, and I think he said 12.

Mr. BORAH. Fifteen.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Twenty-five was the last statement.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, 25 buffalo do not need 10,000 acres of land. I just had the one object in asking to have it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The next committee amendment passed over was at the top of page 57, to insert:

For the establishment of a winter game (elk) reserve in the State of Wyoming, which shall be located in that section of Wyoming lying south of the Yellowstone Park, and shall include not less than 2,000 acres in township 41 north, ranges 115 and 116 west, $50,000, to be available until expended, and the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to purchase said lands with improvements, to erect necessary buildings and inclosures, and to incur other expenses necessary for the maintenance of the reserve.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that that go over, to be considered in connection with the forest-reserve provisions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be passed over on the request of the Senator from Idaho, if there be no objection.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator think that that has any reference to the forest-reserve portion of the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. In my judgment it has, and the proposition there will be discussed in connection with the forest reserves.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say to the Senator that the reserve proposed to be created is not in any existing forest reserve, and the provisions relating to the forest reserves would have no reference to this item.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is true; but I intend to trespass upon the patience of the Senate while I consider the propriety of creating game preserves, for which there is no law, and to consider the question as to whether or not we are now going to inaugurate a law for the creation of game preserves.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator that this hardly affects that question. The elk drift out in the winter from the Yellowstone Park—which of course is an old reserve, established long before there were any forest reservations—and many of them die every winter unless taken care of. It is in the interest of economy to provide a place into which they may drift in winter, that they may there be provided for and go back to the Yellowstone Park in the summer season.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am personally acquainted with those elk; I have seen them in their home, and I have eaten some of them in the neighborhood of it. I believe in protecting them. I would protect those elk until they can get Jersey cows up there. I thought when some Senator spoke about having an animal—I think it was the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]—which would furnish clothing and food that we have that kind of an animal out in Idaho that will take the place of any of them, and that is the sheep. I am not going to prolong the discussion over this matter. I only want to say that I am going to discuss, in connection with this bill, the right and the propriety of creating game preserves.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not understand that the Senator insisted upon the amendment going over.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I can raise the question on the amendment in the Senate if I desire to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 88, after line 19, it is proposed to insert the following:

And in order to carry out the purposes mentioned in section 3 of the act of March 1, 1911, entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," there is hereby appropriated and made available until expended so much of the maximum sums mentioned in said section for the fiscal years 1912 to 1915, inclusive, as shall remain unexpended at the close of each of said fiscal years.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that that go over. That is so intimately associated with the question to be discussed which is reserved that I think it ought to go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will go over. That completes the committee amendments, except those passed over.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, lines 23 and 24, it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out "three hundred and sixty thousand" and inserting in lieu thereof "five hundred and sixty thousand," so as to read:

For farmers' cooperative demonstrations and for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil, $560,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, it will be noticed that for the boll weevil the House appropriated $332,960, and for the farmers' demonstration work only the sum of $30,000 was appropriated. We have been appropriating money for the buffalo and other animals, and I want to increase the appropriation for farm demonstration work from $30,000 to $200,000.

Farm demonstration work is doing more for this country to-day, by reason of a fund Mr. Rockefeller has given, than anything else in aiding our people in increasing the yield and the acreage in wheat and in corn. This is but a small pittance, but it will help in demonstrating to the farmers what kind of seed to use, the necessity of getting new seed, and increasing the acreage in corn and cotton. I think it is a very important matter, and I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will accept the amendment.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, this amendment was not presented to the committee, and I should like to have it go over until to-morrow, so as to have time to consider it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina withdraw the amendment?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; let it stand, and it can be taken up to-morrow.

Mr. BURNHAM. Very well; let that be the understanding. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 14, 1912, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, this being the day set apart for the consideration of business from the Committee on the District of Columbia, I move to take up Senate bill 2224, to amend "An act to regulate the height of buildings in the District of Columbia," approved June 1, 1910.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I request the Speaker to lay before the House House joint resolution 39, with a Senate amendment, in the nature of a conference report.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I ask for the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. It is a privileged report.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would like to inquire whether the bill referred to by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] is here in the shape of a conference report or not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is not a conference report, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the House that where there is a dispute about conference reports and other matters being taken up, in the very nature of things the conference reports ought to have the right of way.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER. There is this much to be said about it: The matter is here in the shape of an attempt to try to get the two Houses together upon it.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Speaker made a reference to conference reports.

The SPEAKER. Yes; the Chair stated that, but the Chair was referring to the machinery of the House that tends to bring a matter in conference to an ultimate conclusion.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; but I desire to suggest to the Speaker, if the Chair will permit, that there is a difference as a matter of privilege between the consideration of a conference report and a mere matter on the Speaker's table, a report or message from the Senate informing the House of its action upon a certain measure. As I undersand the situation—and if I am incorrect in the statement that I make of it I would be glad to be corrected by the Speaker—if I understand the proposition before the House correctly, there is no report of the conferees of the House, no report to the House of the result of their conference. The conferees on the part of the House have not made any report to the House. The Senate conferees reported to the Senate a disagreement. The Senate, on motion of a Senator, took a vote upon the proposition that the Senate recede from its amendment to the House resolution. The Senate voted down that proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will be glad to answer it if I can.

The SPEAKER. Is not the whole machinery about conference reports, and so on, and so on, made privileged for the purpose of reaching the ultimate stage of any legislation?

Mr. BARTLETT. That is true. But we have no conference report here, Mr. Speaker, and if there was a report from the conferees, then it would be a matter of absolute privilege to take it up and for the House to dispose of the matter. I do not wish to occupy the position, Mr. Speaker, that business upon the Speaker's table can not be called up and disposed of, but I do occupy the position, Mr. Speaker, that a conference report is of greater privilege and priority than a mere message from the Senate informing the House of the action of the Senate upon a particular House bill or resolution; and therefore I rose to a parliamentary inquiry before the proposition was put or acted upon, in order that the Speaker might state to the House the exact parliamentary situation of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state it, and if he does not state it correctly, somebody that knows exactly the details will please state it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I call the attention of the Speaker to the situation?

Mr. BARTLETT. May I inquire—if the gentleman will allow me to continue for a moment, or I will yield to him if he desires—may I inquire of the Speaker whether the conferees on the part of the House have made any report to the House on the action of the House conferees as to the conference on the difference between the two Houses?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will say no.

The SPEAKER. The conferees of the House have not made any such report. The Senate sent a message over to the House stating that they adhered to the Senate amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Exactly, and that is upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. That is upon the Speaker's table, and it is a privileged matter.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not dispute that proposition, Mr. Speaker. Far be it from me to do so, because I am too familiar with the rules to dispute the proposition. But I suggest to the Speaker, if he will pardon me for making the suggestion, that that did not assume the same character of privilege as would put everything else out of the way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], for instance, has a proposition about a conference report, and if he had brought in a conference report and were in here with the report and he and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] were competing with each other for recognition, the Chair in his discretion would recognize the completed conference report of one committee in preference to an unfinished conference report of the other. But no such situation has arisen here.

Mr. BARTLETT. But, Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will indulge me a moment, the conferees did report to the Senate.

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then I will withdraw from what I said. I thought they did. The Senate conferees went into the Senate and made a motion that the Senate recede from its amendment, which was voted down, and the House conferees, as I understand it, or the Senate conferees, have made no report to either House; and the matter in dispute between the two Houses, so far as the Journals of the two Houses show, is still in conference between the two Houses and not here for consideration.

The SPEAKER. But it is not still in conference, because the conference broke up without an agreement.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, at the proper time I desire to be recognized to make a preferential motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's rights will be protected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the House passed a resolution. It went to the Senate. The Senate amended the resolution. It came back to the House. The House disagreed to the Senate amendment, and the matter went to conference. In the Senate, without any report from the committee of conference, action was taken upon the resolution, as was perfectly proper, and that action has been messaged over to the House and is now on the Speaker's table. It has got beyond the point where it has to go to a committee.

Now, Rule XXIV provides that the daily order of business shall be as follows:

First. Prayer by the Chaplain.
Second. Reading and approval of the Journal.
Third. Correction of reference of public bills.
Fourth. Disposal of business on the Speaker's table.

This resolution is on the Speaker's table to be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is correct. The Chair will make a general statement about this, as it will save trouble hereafter.

The Chair has no knowledge of what sort of motion the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] proposes to make, and the Chair does not care to know. That is the gentleman's right. He may ask for a new conference, if he wants to, to insist on consideration of the Senate amendment; or he may move to concur in the Senate amendment; or he may make any other motion that is proper; and if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] wants to make a preferential motion, he has a perfect right to do it; but the entire machinery of the House, especially with reference to conference reports, is intended, in the light of the experience of the House, to bring things to an ultimate conclusion; because if a conference report did not have the right of way, then there would be no limit to this session except the first Monday in December. In recognizing various gentlemen for various purposes the Chair must keep in view the promotion of necessary public business.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will pardon me, I have made no point of order on the proposition. I merely endeavored, if I could, to get the parliamentary situation before the House, so that those of us who did know what it was might act in accordance with the rules of the House. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not doubt the right of the conferees, or of any Member of the House, to call for the submission of matters upon the Speaker's table which are privileged. The only thing I suggested that might contravene that idea was that that particular kind of privileged matter was not of the degree of privilege that a conference report was, and that is all I have done.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman rose to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; that is all I could do, Mr. Speaker, to get the floor.

The SPEAKER. But under the guise of a parliamentary inquiry the gentleman very skillfully raised two or three points of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not know whether I did it skillfully or not, but I intended to do just exactly what I did.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SIMS. Was not to-day set apart by unanimous consent for consideration of business coming from the District Committee?

The SPEAKER. This is the regular District day.

Mr. SIMS. The regular District day, and not by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY POPULAR VOTE.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I request the Chair to lay before the House House joint resolution 39, with the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a certain House joint resolution, with Senate amendments, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of House joint resolution 39, proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the resolution of the Senate adhering to its amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
April 23, 1912.

Resolved, That the Senate further insist upon its amendment to the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose at the proper time to move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and concur in the same.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman make that motion now?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I do not make that motion now, but I am simply trying to notify gentlemen of what I propose to do.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have a preferential motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Georgia in ample time.

Mr. BARTLETT. But, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] has the floor.

Mr. BARTLETT. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. My point of order is that if the gentleman from Missouri declines to make any motion at all, then any Member who has a preferential motion has a right to make that motion now.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly the right to make a motion is not confined to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have announced what motion I intend to make.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have to make his motion.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment known as the Bristow amendment, and concur in the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and concur therein.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the preferential motion which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

To concur in the Senate amendment with the following amendment: "Provided, That Congress shall not have power or authority to provide for the qualifications of electors of United States Senators within the various States of the United States, nor to authorize the appointment of supervisors of election, judges of election, or returning boards to certify the results of any such election, nor to authorize the use of United States marshals or the military forces of the United States or troops of the United States at the polls during said election.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Having offered a preferential motion which tends to bring the two Houses together, I claim that that is the first question to be debated, and that the Member offering that motion is to have control of the time and debate so far as his side is concerned upon that motion.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly, when the time for voting comes the motion offered by the gentleman from Georgia is first to be voted upon.

Mr. BARTLETT. But, Mr. Speaker, that is not the point of order I made.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I claim that I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri was recognized and is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, unless there can be an agreement for a reasonable time for debate within an hour the gentleman from Missouri will move the previous question on these motions. If there is anybody opposed to this measure, I will agree as to the time to be allowed for debate.

Mr. BARTLETT. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I raise the point of order, and ask the judgment of the Chair upon it, that the gentleman from Missouri having moved to concur in the Senate amendment, and I having made a preferential motion to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment, which motion takes precedence over the motion to concur, that that motion is to be first disposed of, and that the party offering the motion is entitled to proceed and discuss that motion and control the time for one hour.

The SPEAKER. The situation is this: Both motions are pending, and when the vote is taken the vote will first be taken on the motion offered by the gentleman from Georgia. In the meantime the gentleman from Missouri has the floor and is entitled to one hour. He is entitled to do what he pleases with that hour under the rules of the House. If he wants to move the previous question he has the right so to do.

Mr. BARTLETT. Anybody can move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. But he can not do it while the gentleman from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, if we can not agree as to the time for general debate something will occur suddenly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, there is no question as to what the gentleman from Missouri will do.

Mr. PAYNE. There is nobody on this side that is opposed to this proposition.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Is there anybody on this side of the House that is opposed to the proposition?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] as having charge of the opposition.

Mr. BARTLETT. And I am proud to occupy that position, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. How much time does the gentleman from Georgia want for debate?

Mr. BARTLETT. I want about an hour myself.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. And how much time for that side?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a question for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Touching this matter?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Touching this matter.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think the gentleman from Missouri and I can agree upon the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to make a request.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that 30 minutes' time be allowed to the gentleman from Missouri and 30 minutes' time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. MANN. And at the end of that time the previous question to be considered as ordered?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that debate on this matter shall extend for one hour, the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Georgia shall have half an hour each, and that at the end of the hour the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate may be limited to two hours—one hour on a side, the gentleman from Georgia to control one hour and I to control the other.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks, in lieu of the request of the gentleman from Texas, that general debate be limited to two hours, one hour on a side; that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] may control one hour and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] the other hour; and at the end of the expiration of the two hours the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. BARTLETT. The previous question on what?

The SPEAKER. On these two motions. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to know if the business for District day will follow immediately after this matter is disposed of?

The SPEAKER. The District business will follow immediately after these motions are disposed of unless a supplemental privileged motion or request is made. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PEPPER, for eight days, on account of important business.

To Mr. HEFLIN, for one week, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. KAHN, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of House bill 5748, granting a pension to Mary Burnet, Sixty-second Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY POPULAR VOTE.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have read from the Clerk's desk a letter written April 27, 1912, by John M. Stahl, of Chicago, legislative agent of the Farmers' National Congress, on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

FARMERS' NATIONAL CONGRESS,
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Chicago, April 27, 1912.

Hon. WILLIAM W. RUCKER,
The House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Farmers' National Congress, which for 20 years has advocated the direct election of United States Senators, is indeed gratified to observe that the joint resolution bearing on this reform is about to receive the sanction of both Houses, and largely because of the conciliatory attitude of the House. This confirms the opinion we have always entertained and expressed that the Congress of the United States is a remarkably high-minded, honorable, and patriotic body, earnestly desiring to do that which will be for the public welfare and ready to surrender small differences of opinion to gain real progress and reform.

We most earnestly hope that when the joint resolution above referred to comes to a vote in the House next week that it will receive a large favorable vote, making such a large majority in its favor as will carry much weight to State legislatures.

The farmers of the United States are watching with much interest the course of the two Houses of Congress on this and other measures, and will note with interest the votes of individual Members of Congress.

I most earnestly ask you to use a moment of the precious time of the House to communicate to it the very earnest wish of the farmers of the United States, as expressed through the Farmers' National Congress, for the passage of the joint resolution for the direct election of Senators, coupled with our very high opinion of the Congress of the United States and belief in its sincerity, ability, and patriotism.

I have the honor to be,
Very respectfully, yours,

JOHN M. STAHL,
Legislative Agent, Farmers' National Congress.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Missouri yields the floor I would like to ask him if he has a letter from the Woman's National Suffrage Association, or Mrs. Bennett, of Kentucky, which he could read to the House?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I have received a letter from the gentleman's constituent, which I will transmit to him.

Mr. AUSTIN. She is not a constituent of mine.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to know who has the conclusion of this debate as it now stands, the gentleman from Missouri or myself? The first motion comes from him, but my motion is a preferential motion, and being the first to be voted on should I not have the close of the debate?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would think that the gentleman from Missouri has the right to conclude the debate.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. That has been the universal practice.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not think it has been the universal practice.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Missouri brings the two Houses together.

Mr. BARTLETT. So does mine, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. If some gentleman were to arise and make the motion to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, why, then, according to his own theory, the closing of debate would shift to that Member.

Mr. BARTLETT. Not at all, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The parliamentary practice is that I would have the closing of debate.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman has not investigated the practice.

The SPEAKER. The practice is, a Member occupying the position of the gentleman from Missouri, with reference to this bill, would have the closing.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. And the gentleman from Georgia knows the precedents—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is willing to hear the gentleman on the question of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. I merely wanted to have the question of procedure settled.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the closing of debate rests with the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BARTLETT. All right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia for one hour.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that a question of so much importance to all the people of the United States, involving a question of a radical change in the form of our Government, should be permitted to be considered but for an hour on each side. It is unfortunate that a proposition so vital to the welfare, the continued progress of prosperity of the section from which I come—to the 13 States of this Union known as the Southern States—in which they are vitally interested, should be permitted to be discussed so briefly. It is still more unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, that a proposition which has time and time again received the condemnation of this Democratic House, certainly upon two roll calls, should now be approved by this House and the Democratic position thereon reversed, and that only an hour should be given to those who would uphold the right and dignity of this House; it is true that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] can take an hour to show the reasons why he has receded from his former position, but he may occupy the entire hour himself, he may occupy the entire day if he chooses, he may speak until the hours become days and the days become weeks and the weeks become years and the years become cycles and ages, but the gentleman from Missouri will never be able to satisfy the country and this House why this radical change on the position which he presents to the House is justified. Mr. Speaker, I recall some of the history of this resolution. Last year, on April 13, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] offered, as an amendment to the Rucker resolution, this same identical amendment, which reappears as the Bristow Senate amendment. It was advocated then by Members upon that side, and especially and strongly by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON]. In the debate the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] himself resisted its adoption in earnest and eloquent language, and called upon this side of the House to vote down this proposition, and upon a roll call a majority of 66 Democrats was then recorded against the identical proposition. On the 21st of April, 1911, when a motion was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] that the House concur in the amendment, and the gentleman from Missouri again was heard in debate against it, the House, by a majority of 60—111 yeas and 171 nays—refused to concur in this Senate amendment. Through the long summer months, the fall months, and the winter months, and now into the coming of summer again, this proposition lay in the conference committee, with a determination on the part of the conferees to stand by the will of the House and not to accede to the demands of the Senate.

And now, Mr. Speaker, we have the remarkable proposition, without any report from the conference committee, that the House turn its back upon what it did upon former occasions upon this very identical bill and vote to take up the Senate amendment and adopt it by concurring in it. Mr. Speaker, this amendment has somewhat of a history. In the last Congress it was what is known as the Sutherland amendment, and it was voted down in the Senate, and the very Senator who is the author of this amendment in the Senate this Congress, a Senator from Kansas, voted against this proposition, then known as the "Sutherland amendment." When he returned home to Kansas meetings were held and certain organizations of colored voters demanded that Congress pass this amendment, and the Senator from Kansas offered it again and became its chief champion.

So this might well be dubbed "the Kansas Negro amendment to the Constitution." But time passed, and still no sign of agreement by our conferees, until there came to this city a few days ago a distinguished Democrat, who is the titular head of the party, or at least until we can have another convention; and after a conference with certain leaders of this House it was announced in the newspaper which I hold in my hand—the Washington Post—that Mr. Bryan had come, and after he had conferred with certain gentlemen—the Speaker of this House, the chairman of the Committee on Rules, the chairman of the Committee on Election of President and Vice President—orders had been given to have the House act upon this amendment and recede from its disagreement with the Senate and to accept the same. That is published in the Washington Post.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. May I ask the gentleman from Georgia a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Do I understand that the paper said that orders had been given?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not say the paper said orders had been given, but that is the effect of it, and from what is now occurring it looks very much like orders were given and they are being followed.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. That is the gentleman's conclusion about it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Of course, that is my conclusion and that is the conclusion that everyone would draw from this article and the change of front of the gentleman. What other reason can the gentleman from Missouri give for his turnabout face upon this proposition? The gentleman from Missouri marches out of this House backed by a majority of 66, and 60 of his Democratic colleagues of this House, enthused with the belief that he was right, and enthused, I apprehend, with a determination to stand by the will of the House. We supposed that like a knight errant, panoplied with the right that this House should have its will when 66 majority demanded it he would insist on it and we followed him, and we followed him in the contest believing that he would stand firm against the senatorial position and not yield. And lo and behold, instead of being a knight errant, bold and gallant, we find him a mere Don Quixote, returning with his favorite bill upon a stretcher after he had charged the windmills of the Senate. [Laughter and applause.] So the gentleman from Missouri comes back disfigured, maimed, his lance broken, followed by his faithful attendant, the gentleman from New York, whom I will not call his Sancho Panza, because, while he was the only attendant of the gentleman from Missouri in this wonderful crazy charge upon the Senate windmills, still the gentleman from New York did endeavor valiantly to uphold the dignity and right of the House.

So, Mr. Speaker, we are asked to-day to reverse our position. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], after pledges to the House by his vote, comes back and asks that this amendment, originating in Kansas, demanded chiefly and first by the negro voters of Kansas at the hands of Senator BRISTOW, who before had voted against it, shall be agreed to; that this House shall forget its dignity, subvert its will, and pass a law which means the death of this amendment, for, if adopted, it will tend to bring about ruin and chaos again in the sections which some of us represent, and will never receive the approval of those States.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know how else to account for the sudden change of opinion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER]. I do not know how to account for it unless there be some overweening and dominant power that demands this legislation at our hands. I revere great statesmen; I love my party; I have never scratched a ticket from President to coroner.

I come from a section of country, Mr. Speaker, that during all the political defeats and adversities of the party has never wavered in its devotion to Democracy. We have kept alive, like the vestal virgins of old, the faith and the fire burning upon the altar of our party when others, including Missouri, followed strange gods and hungered after the fleshpots of Egypt. [Applause.] We have not asked for offices, nor have we asked a share in the administration of the Government. I have stood in this House when only 100 Democrats from all this vast domain of ours could answer the roll call on this side; when there were only 10 Democrats from all the States other than the Southern States. But through such times we have kept the flag flying, we have kept the faith, we have kept the sacred fire alight upon the altar, asking nothing, demanding nothing. You can have your offices, you can have your patronage, but keep away from us the prospects and the probability of reenactment of the former infamous Federal election laws. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I will not recount, because time is too short and the occasion does not demand it, the tribulation, the sorrows, the suffering, the horror, and the infamy of those years—1867 to 1894—when the Federal election law was on the statute books up to the hour when they were repealed by a Democratic Congress. The act of 1894 repealing these Federal election laws was signed by that illustrious Democratic President—the only one we have elected since the war—and he will go down in history as a great President along with Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, though perhaps not so great, but able, honest, faithful, and true—Grover Cleveland, of New York. [Applause.] Some may differ from me as to his greatness, some may malign him, but he will live in history as a great President, who tried to do right as he saw it, when those who have maligned and defamed him are justly forgotten.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this Senate amendment is plain. The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], while this amendment was being discussed, said:

> My proposition is, that if the Members of the Senate are to be elected at popular elections, the Government of the United States must retain the power to make those elections honest and fair and free; the power to say, if the regulations prescribed by the State are not adequate to that end, that they shall be superseded by regulations made by the Congress of the United States. My proposition further is that without that power accompanying this change in the method of the election of Senators, if the change be made, the Government of the United States has surrendered the power for its own preservation and protection.

As evidence of the purpose of the advocates of this amendment I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of date February 10, 1911, as follows:

> Mr. BACON. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator from New York to mean that if the States have now upon their statute books laws which regulate the suffrage in those States, such as the Senator speaks of as "the grandfather clause," though that is simply a term generic in its character which relates to a general class of legislation—does the Senator mean that, with the laws now upon the statute books of the several Southern States, if the proposed amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] should be adopted and we should pass the joint resolution to amend the Constitution and it should be ratified by three-fourths of the States, it would then be within the power of Congress, if it conceived that these grandfather clauses, as they are called, all the body of laws with reference to the regulations and limitations of the suffrage in the Southern States—if Congress should conceive that they were unconstitutional, does the Senator mean that, in his opinion, Congress would have the power, under the amendment of the Senator from Utah, to annul those provisions and to make Federal laws to control the election of Senators in such way as to insure the right to vote to all persons thought by Congress to be entitled to vote?
> Mr. ROOT. Without the slightest doubt.
> Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, it is well that we are given this notice of what the Senator does mean and what the Sutherland amendment means.
> Mr. ROOT. I meant to put you on notice, and I mean to put the whole country on notice if my words are able to do so.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] concede that the Federal Government has power to fix the qualification of voters?

Mr. BARTLETT. Concede its power to fix the qualification of voters?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Of voters.

Mr. BARTLETT. In the case of Congressmen; yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. That the Federal Government has the power to fix the qualifications of voters?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; I do.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I just wanted to get the gentleman's statement of it.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the gentleman will read the case of Siebold v. the United States he will find the courts so held.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I merely want to say that the gentleman knows a good many authorities, where the Supreme Court has held affirmatively time and again that the General Government has no such power.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia has tried to become familiar with the authorities upon this question, and I could give the names of the cases and the volumes in which they are to be found if I had the time. The gentleman has confounded that proposition with the idea that the Congress of the United States has not the power under the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to prescribe the qualifications, and the States having prescribed them, and not having violated the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, in not making the distinction on account of race, color, or previous condition, the Supreme Court, God bless it, has sustained our franchise laws.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I understand——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER]?

Mr. BARTLETT. I have to yield.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. No; you do not.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will yield.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I beg the gentleman's pardon. As I understand the decision upon this, after the State has enacted a law fixing the qualification of voters then the Federal Government has power to see that every State exercises the law prescribed by the State.

Mr. BARTLETT. I put the opinion of Senator ROOT against the gentleman. Then the Senator gives us notice as to what it does mean, and that the Bristow amendment means that Congress, under this amendment, will have power to fix the qualifications of electors, and to the question that the Senator asked him on the floor of the Senate he said, "Without the slightest doubt."

He said:

I mean to put you on notice now, and put the whole country on notice, if my words can do so.

I do not know what the law may be, but I know what the great lawyer in the Senate who advocated it said it meant, and he put the country on notice that he intended it to mean that. That may be an answer to the gentleman; I do not know.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Is not this clause in the amendment: "The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors in the most numerous branch of the legislature"?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; it has been there ever since the Constitution was enacted.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman claim that under that provision the Congress of the United States would have the right to go into the States and prescribe the qualifications of the voters?

Mr. BARTLETT. I think that fixes the qualifications of electors when they shall be qualified to vote for the most numerous branch of the legislature.

Mr. COOPER. I always understood, and was taught so when I first began the study of law, that suffrage was not a Federal right at all, but that it was a privilege conferred by a State, and the only condition prescribed by a State was that when the State fixes the qualifications there should be no discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will read what Mr. BRISTOW, the author of this amendment, said on the subject:

I do not believe it takes away from the Federal Government the power to appoint a marshal or organize an army, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] indicates with such emphasis. If the Federal Government can organize an army now to protect any State or the elections in any State, it can do so if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Under the Constitution as it is to-day, and as the gentleman will leave it, has not the Congress the right to go into a State so far as the election of Representatives in Congress is concerned? If the gentleman wants to conjure up a scarecrow——

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, if the gentleman wants to ask me a question, I will be glad to answer it; but the gentleman ought not to undertake to argue the question in my time.

Mr. COOPER. We have not changed the authority of Congress?

Mr. BARTLETT. No; and you will not succeed in enacting this amendment, because the States will not vote for it.

Mr. COOPER. So far as the action of Congress is concerned, does the gentleman apprehend any danger from Members of Congress?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not for the present.

Mr. COOPER. Then why do you apprehend any danger for your Senators? The same people will vote at the same election.

Mr. BARTLETT. Well, I wish I had more time to give the gentleman an opportunity to make a speech against my amendment. I do not think he hurts it any. On the contrary, I think he helps it.

Mr. Speaker, I was a Member of this House for 16 years, when the Republicans had the majority; I have seen Republicans discountenance and vote down and frown down any effort to reenact a Federal election law or to deprive us of representation because of our election laws in the Southern States, passed to protect us from the ignorant and vicious voter. Twenty-two years ago, when that great Speaker and statesman, Thomas B. Reed, was at the helm in this House, nobody was permitted to do it, although certain distinguished Republicans, on account of overzeal or through reasons of expediency, offered the amendment. Then followed that noble and genial gentleman, David B. Henderson, from Iowa, who was a one-legged Federal soldier who had fought for the cause of the Union and left a part of his manly body upon the battle field. He also frowned upon it. Then came that great old Roman, honest, earnest, sincere, Uncle JOE CANNON, as Speaker. [Applause.] I do not believe with him politically, and do not agree with many things that he did; I have censured him from the political standpoint; but he stood like the rock of Gibraltar, even in a Republican caucus, where his own political life might be at stake, and frowned down and fought down and voted down any effort to rejuvenate and renew the infamous Federal election laws or to injure the South. [Applause.]

And while others may censure, while others may criticize and malign and abuse him, justly or unjustly, he has a place in the hearts of the people of the South that will not be erased because of his generous treatment of the southern people. [Applause.] He may have made political success possible for some of us; nevertheless he did, although stalwart Republican, as he was, as much as anybody to allay the bitterness of the past between the sections, and I take this occasion to give him the thanks of my people. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last there gathered within my home town the remnant of the Confederate veterans, the last fragment of that heroic and glorious army that marched beneath the fiery flag of the Southern Confederacy and immortalized southern bravery and valor on every battle field of the Civil War. [Applause.] In thinned ranks and with wasted and tottering forms they joined together with their comrades in celebrating the glories of the past and the valor of their comrades. Before they adjourned, with only one dissenting voice in a meeting of 16,000 soldiers, they passed a resolution in response to the invitation of Gen. Tribble, the commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, agreeing that next year they would meet him and the survivors of the Union Army on the battle field of Gettysburg [applause] to celebrate the anniversary of that great battle by recalling its memories with one another on the field where 50 years ago they stood in battle array, with bayonets pointed at each other's throats, confronting death, and making immortal not simply Union soldiers' and Confederate soldiers' valor, but making immortal the heroism of the American soldier. [Applause.] Is it not time, in God's name, that legislation should stop or, rather, not be renewed, that would reopen the scars that have healed? And shall it be the work of a Democratic House to again reopen and renew the bitterness of the past?

Even to the gentlemen who fathered these propositions that a Republican Congress voted down I now bear no animosity nor do my people bear any animosity. We honor you, because you have recognized the peculiar situation in my country and have said to us, "God bless you in your efforts to solve a problem the like of which no people in the tide of time ever faced."

And now, when Republicans for 16 years have refrained from doing it, the Democratic majority, at the demand of somebody, proposes to do what a Republican House never permitted to find its way on the calendar. When I say to my people at home that my Democratic friends in the North, the East, and the West in a Democratic House have done that which no Republican House ever succeeded in doing when it had a majority ranging at times from 13 to 150, I will tell you what they will say to me. We have followed the Democratic flag. We followed Bryan in three unsuccessful campaigns. Some of us here have taken our political lives in our hands in order to support him. There are friends and neighbors of mine who did not agree with him, and it has taken 15 years to allay their opposition, simply because I was a supporter of the present titular leader of my party. But neither Mr. Bryan, nor the Speaker of this House, nor the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], chairman of the Committee on Rules, nor the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] can drive me or compel me to vote for a proposition which my nature condemns and which my people universally denounce. [Applause.] When a Democratic House shall put this infamy upon my people—I measure my words and mean what I say, with all due respect for those who vote for it and without meaning any offense—when a Democratic House shall put this infamy upon my people, I will give you notice now, in order that you may well reflect upon it, that you test to the breaking point our party loyalty in the coming election. We are for tariff reform. We are for the exercise of the powers of government to control and regulate interstate commerce and to regulate the trusts. We are for an economical expenditure of the Government funds; but, above all these, is our determination to preserve white supremacy. I hear it whispered by some that this is poor Democracy, but those who favor this proposition will not receive the indorsement and support of my people. I am as true a Democrat as ever lived. I have never scratched a ticket, as I have stated, from President to coroner, and I never shall.

But above the question of the tariff and the economical administration of the Government and the control of trusts and the regulation of interstate commerce arises this vital question for my people. And if a Republican majority would not put it on us for 16 years, shall it be said that the first Democratic majority in 16 years shall do that which no Republican Congress since 1890 ever dared to do? If so, then my people, while they are better Democrats than the people who support these propositions, will not give their approval or their sanction to that set of men who indorse such a doctrine. Call that treason if you please. But if that be treason to the Democratic Party, make the most of it. [Applause.]

How much time have I consumed, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has consumed 35 minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I feel deeply in this matter, and I fear I have taxed my own strength and the patience of the House too far. I would not ordinarily speak as I do, but I feel deeply upon this proposition. I would not utter what I have said, nor would I endeavor to call attention to the difference in the party concerning this proposition, but the party might as well understand it. We have never faltered in our faith to the candidate or to the ticket. When others deserted, when others failed, with the ring of the true metal we answered every call.

This is vital. This bill gives Congress authority to erect in our midst an election board, a returning board, election judges, and supervisors. My amendment prevents Congress from doing these things. As a boy, and even after I grew to manhood, I have seen elections conducted beneath the bayonets of United States troops, by United States marshals, by Federal supervisors, and returning boards. I experienced the nightmare and the horror of it. We have got away from that, thanks in great measure to the patience, to the good will, to the desire of the Republican Party to let us alone. To those who in this great struggle have given us their sympathy we extend our thanks.

We are grateful to those of you who in that great trial gave us your help and forbearance. To those of you over on that side or on this side—Republicans, Populists, or Democrats—who in this hour propose to enact such a law and criticize us for resisting it, I say to you that we shall go on pursuing the course we feel to be right, and those who censure and criticize us will be consigned to the calm indifference of our contempt. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the wisest man the world is said ever to have known, the man who wrote the Proverbs, said once:

> There be three things which are too wonderful for me; yea, four which I know not:
> The way of an eagle in the air, the way of a serpent upon a rock, the way of a ship in the midst of the sea, and the way of a man with a maid.

Unfortunately for Solomon he did not live in this day. The other thing that would have been too strange and wonderful for him would be the ways of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] in his performance as conferee between the two Houses. Solomon was not wise enough to understand it, and therefore I will not undertake it.

Mr. Speaker, I have presented, hurriedly and disconnectedly, my objections to this amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Always.

Mr. PROUTY. The gentleman several times during this discussion has referred to 13 States. What States did the gentleman refer to?

Mr. BARTLETT. Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia—I will speak for Georgia by authority—Alabama, Tennessee, Arkansas, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and Oklahoma. These States that went through the hell and fire of reconstruction.

Mr. PROUTY. The gentleman means the Confederate States, the States that formed the southern confederacy?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. PROUTY. And the gentleman is opposed to the amendment because it gives to the Federal Government power to supervise elections?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. PROUTY. Did the gentleman know that the constitution of the southern confederacy provided for exactly the same thing that we are seeking to put in?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not care if it did; I would not vote for it now.

Mr. PROUTY. Article 1, section 5, paragraph 1:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, subject to the provisions of this constitution, but the Congress may at any time make or alter such regulations, except as to the time and place of choosing Senators.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the same as it is in the Constitution of the United States and has been since 1789.

Mr. PROUTY. And the gentleman is trying to take it out.

Mr. BARTLETT. No; I am not trying to take it out. I want it to stay in. It is the provision that you were trying to amend.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my amendment proposes simply to provide that Congress shall not have any power hereafter to supervise the voters in a State, to establish election boards, appoint supervisors of election or returning boards, or to use the Army or the United States marshals at the polls. If that is adopted, then this amendment can be adopted. I appeal to every man on this side of the House, every Democrat, to vote for that amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I know not what may be the result of this amendment. I know that the Democratic Party ought to grant to that great Democratic region from which I come and from which the majority Members on this side come, the poor privilege of adopting this amendment of mine before it passes this new law amending the Constitution. I know as far as the ultimate results are concerned that it will never become a law by amendment of the Constitution of the United States if it is not agreed to, for the adoption of the Bristow amendment rings the death knell for this original resolution.

Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, we of the South shall go on in the future as we have in the past. In spite of reconstruction and its infamous results, in spite of the Federal election laws, in spite of all that we have arisen from our desolation and our destruction until we stand united, unrivaled in our commercial and agricultural powers and everything that makes up great and powerful States. The vine has yielded its fruit, the earth its increase, and the sun in the heavens the sunshine, the dew and the rain, and in spite of Republican law we have prospered. We are prosperous because we have been enabled by our own efforts to solve in our own way and in God's own appointed time the problems that confronted us. If this opportunity shall be taken now to retard that great prosperity by a Democratic House, well and good, Mr. Speaker, we shall go on in the future as in the past, devoted to our principles of local self-government and the supremacy of the Anglo-Saxon race. We will make our way forward still, and we will stand by our convictions and duties regardless of party, regardless of objections, regardless of all things till—

> Wrapt in flames the realms of ether glow
> And heaven's last thunder shakes the world below.

[Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves the balance of his time, which is 15 mintues.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] is recognized.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of regret that I can not relieve the anxiety of the gentleman from Georgia by agreeing with him in his position. I come from the same part of this country from which he hails, the South, and have no dread of the occurrences predicted by him in his remarks. I am against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] to the motion made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], because I know that if this amendment goes back to the Senate of the United States by reason of the Bartlett encumbrance the election of Senators by direct vote of the people will be postponed for many years, and the proposition will die there. [Applause.]

I am in favor of the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people of the respective States of this Union.

Mr. Speaker, much has been said on this question, and yet it seems to me that it is necessary to say but little in order to arrive at a correct solution of the problems before us. The gentleman's argument has covered a wide range of topics not at all relevant to the subject. In the first place, he has stated that Mr. Bryan had come to the city of Washington and whispered in the ears of the Speaker and the gentleman from Missouri and my ear that the Bristow amendment should be adopted. Mr. Speaker, long before I talked with Mr. Bryan about this matter, and long before knowing his position, I wired the gentleman from Missouri while I was in Worcester, Mass., favoring the motion he is making to-day and wished to be paired in favor of it.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have not the time to yield and regret it. Let me say for the gentleman's benefit to-day that if he would allow himself to follow Mr. Bryan a little oftener he would be more frequently right. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. And be certain to get beat, too, every time. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; as long as Democrats stab the Democratic nominee there is danger of defeat. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the truth, whether it is acceptable or not.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, Mr. Speaker, let us argue this question as lawyers should and see what it means. We find in the Constitution as our fathers wrote it originally, Article I, section 3:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years.

That was the original clause. Then we turn over to section 4 and call to it the attention of this House and the country to-day in order that we may understand the question upon which we are to vote, and not allow it to be confused by a lot of sophistries, as the gentleman from Georgia is endeavoring to do.

Mr. BARTLETT. Better have sophistries than nothing at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. This section reads:

The times and places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulation except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Why, gentlemen, hearing the supposed argument of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], no one could discover that he had ever read that clause of the Constitution. [Applause.] He conjures up "force bills" and says they will be put upon the South again. There is no man anywhere who has higher regard for the sovereignty and rights of the States than I have, but "force bills" have no terror for me in this day and generation, for they are not again coming. My God, will sectionalism never cease and will not men on both sides of this House lay it aside when we are considering a great constitutional question? [Applause.] Let me say to the gentleman from Georgia that there was never a time during the 125 years' existence of this Government when Congress could not reach out and lay its hands upon every State of this Union in regard to the elections of Senators and Representatives both, except as to the places of choosing the Senators. Now, what does that mean? It simply implies that our fathers saw proper, when they fashioned this Government, to surrender to the Federal Government the power to regulate elections of Representatives and Senators.

Our fathers saw proper, when they fashioned this Government, to surrender to the Federal Government the power to take control of the elections of Representatives if they so desired, and while they have taken charge of the election of Representatives, the same men who voted for Representatives in Congress were voting for the members of the legislature who were to choose the Senators. It is all one election, and every man who intelligently reads the Constitution and statutes understands it. What is the proposed amendment which the gentleman says is so dangerous to the country. Let us anaylze it, which as lawyers and patriotic citizens we should do. Here it is, the Bristow amendment, that the gentleman from Georgia endeavors to make appear so dangerous before the American people:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for the electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

Instead of this Federal Government undertaking to fix the qualifications of electors, this amendment leaves in the Constitution the power providing that the States shall fix the qualification of the electors that choose the Senators and Representatives for the State legislatures. [Applause.] It preserves that right to the people of the various States, and does not take it away from them. Let gentlemen meet the question as it is written in the very face of the amendment and not try to confuse it with sophistry. What more? It proceeds to provide—

That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

That is the Bristow amendment, and is all there is to it. The gentleman from Georgia is trying to strike out of the Constitution something that was placed there when this Government was formed. [Applause.]

I am trying to keep in the Constitution what our fathers wrote there in order that we may this day institute one of the greatest reforms in the history of the Government by providing for the election of United States Senators. [Applause.] Ah, Mr. Speaker, if we will but concur in this amendment we will have no force bills in the future. There will be brotherly love between the people of every part of this great country; there will be no endeavor on the part of Senators and Representatives to stifle the voice in the different States; but the time will come, and that speedily, when the voters will choose their own Senators by direct election. Expulsion and charges of corruption may cease at the other end of the Capitol [applause], and that body will be the people's forum as well as this House, and destroy the power that now controls legislatures and fills some seats with those who are friendly to special privilege and predatory wealth and those seeking favors from the Government. Therefore I am glad of the opportunity to vote for this motion made by the gentleman from Missouri, and thus vote down the amendment designed to bury it in the Senate of the United States, where it can never again come to life. [Applause.] I am glad to say on this occasion that if we concur in the Bristow amendment we do no violence to those things our fathers placed in the Constitution, but preserve and perpetuate their ideas of government, the genius of this Republic, and make it possible for the people to control every branch of their Governments, both Federal and State. Therefore I proudly cast my vote in favor of the motion offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER.] [Loud applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, right at this point, since the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] has awakened so suddenly to a knowledge of the Constitution, I desire to call the attention of the House to the votes of the gentleman from Texas upon this constitutional question on two separate occasions. On the 13th day of April, 1911, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] offered this identical proposition as an amendment to the Rucker bill amending the Constitution. After argument, in which, I believe but I am not positive, the gentleman from Texas participated, a roll call was had on that day, and upon this roll call the gentleman from Texas, the constitutional lawyer from Texas, so well informed of what it means now, voted "no," to be found on page 241 of the RECORD. Again, on June 21, 1911, this identical Bristow amendment was up before the House and a motion was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], one of the conferees upon this bill, to concur in that amendment and to concur in this amendment now pending which is to be voted upon, and the gentleman from Texas, who now parades himself as so well informed upon the question and the want of danger in the amendment, voted "no," and that is to be found on page 2433 of the RECORD of this Congress. Men change, times change, but the gentleman from Texas keeps pace even with the gentleman from Missouri in his kaleidoscopic changes on this question. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] five minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, before I begin to address myself to this question, since this matter is of so much importance, I will at this time submit a request that the time be extended 1 hour, 30 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri and 30 minutes by the gentleman from Georgia. This is a very important question, and I ask to submit that request. I have consulted the gentleman from Missouri, and he states that he would not object.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALEXANDER). The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that this debate be extended for one hour, the time to be controlled one-half by the gentleman from Georgia and one-half by the gentleman from Missouri. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SISSON. I hope the gentleman will not object. You had 15 minutes, and many gentlemen here want to speak.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] objects. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] has five minutes.

Mr. SISSON. I ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] to withhold his objection. This is a very important matter to the country. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection, inasmuch as gentlemen seem to be anxious to speak.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made by the gentleman from Mississippi? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. I understand that shall not affect the order as to the previous question?

Mr. SISSON. Not at all.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I am going to be just as frank with the membership of this House as it is possible for a man to be. I realize fully that this amendment places the elections of the Senators in exactly the same condition, if the amendment is voted for by the States, that the Constitution now places the election of Members of the House of Representatives. But there is a vital reason why the fathers of this Republic made a distinction. Under the present Constitution it is not possible for the Federal Government to control the election to both branches of Congress, because under the present Constitution the only thing that the United States Senate can do in reference to the election to the Senate would be to determine whether or not the State legislature had acted honestly and fairly in the election of the Senator. But if this amendment shall go through, then you tear away the legislature of the State and you permit the supervision of elections in the State for Senators just as you may now supervise the election in reference to a Congressman.

Now, in this piping time of peace, when all are dwelling together in unity and fraternal love, we do not need necessarily constitutional protection. And the time may come in the future, in our large territory, which is rapidly being built up, that the cry of Federal encroachment may not come from the South, but from the small New England States, because they are entitled, under the Constitution, to equal representation in the Senate irrespective of the number of people which they have. The large States may become restive over that large representation. The fathers of the Republic so drew this Constitution that the people could protect the Federal Government in the election of Members to the House, and in the event that there was any disposition to change the form of Government and deprive the Federal Government of its rights in the Congress of the United States, it would have the right to protect the Government of the United States. The debates on this question were as voluminous as any other debates at the time the Constitution was adopted, and they reached a compromise so that you might preserve the Federal Government in its sphere and you might protect the State government in its sphere.

The amendment says:

> The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

Who, then, shall determine under the State constitution and the State regulation as to election of United States Senator whether a man is qualified and legally entitled to vote? If you pass a Federal election law, then the law of each State will be construed by a Federal court or it will be construed by a Federal commissioner of elections, and when a qualified elector presents himself at the polls to vote his right to vote will not be determined by officers who are appointed and elected by the State legislature which made the law, by the people of the State who made the constitution, but the construction of that State constitution, the construction of the laws placed on the statute books by the State legislatures, will be construed and enforced by Federal officeholders. Why, gentlemen of the House, I care not what you may write in the statutes of these States. I care not what constitutional provision you may have in times of peace. It is in times of stress and storm and in times of political passion that we need some rock, some anchor and protection. In such times, when the tempest of passion runs high and Congress becomes wild with partisanship and ignores the rights of the minority under the present system, the Supreme Court can protect this minority as it has done in the past, but if this amendment becomes a part of the Constitution and the control of the election shall be in the hands of a brutal majority—put it, if you please, a brutal Democratic majority, a brutal Republican majority, a brutal Socialistic majority—then these officers that shall be elected to fill these elective positions will determine whether these State laws have been complied with, and in so doing will, of course, hold that they were, because their election would be by the same system, and the Executive, being chosen by the same method, would also be biased, and though fraud was so rank that it smelled to heaven the election would be declared regular.

I appeal to the membership of this House to be practical about it. Do not be demagogic. I am in favor of the election of the United States Senators by direct vote of the people, but I want it to be by direct vote of the people of these States in accordance with their own will, in accordance with their own wishes, in accordance with their own constitution; and in order that we may have this you must have the election laws of each State administered by the people that make these State constitutions and the State laws. And if the gentlemen call that demagogic, if you call that sophistry, then indeed you know nothing about how elections are conducted. No man will tell me that the men who fought at the other end of this Capitol so vigorously were fighting for nothing; no man will tell me, when you shall vote down the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], that there is not a purpose somewhere to defeat the election of Senators by direct vote of the people by the States, which will decline to surrender this power.

If that be the purpose, if that be the object, if that be the aim, then you gentlemen who submit this amendment to the people will be looked upon as being enemies of elections of the United States Senators by direct vote of the people. Let us not, in God's name, place this chalice to the lips of the people of the States and ask them to drink it to the dregs. I ask that the State of Maine, of New Hampshire, of Vermont, shall have the sovereign right to determine whom they shall send to the Senate. But you take from them that right when you tell them: "Although you may write your laws you have not the patriotism, you have not the interest, you have not the integrity to enforce them, but we will have the election held by a body that has nothing to do with the making of the laws, and shall have nothing to do with the selection of the officers who hold the election." What an anomaly!

Mr. Speaker, the people of the States should not adopt this amendment in its present form. To do so places all power in the Federal Government. It is not enough to say that the Federal Congress will not exercise its power. Every Member who has spoken on this question, save one or two have said that those of us who oppose the Bristow amendment are unnecessarily alarmed. They say that we are too easily frightened, and that this power will never be exercised, and that if they thought it would that they would be against this amendment. This is an admission that the Bristow amendment is unwise and dangerous. The surest way to prevent Federal control of elections of United States Senators is not to deprive the States of the power to control their own elections. When this amendment is submitted to the States they will be asked to surrender their power over the only branch of the Federal Government that they now control, and to place in the Congress of the United States the power to control the elections in the States. It is begging the question to say that Congress will never avail itself of that power. If it will never avail itself of that power it is because they ought not to have it.

Let us examine a moment and see what the amendment does. If adopted, Congress can appoint officers to take charge of the registration books of the States and determine who may or may not register under the State law. Congress can appoint officers to hold the elections, and allow those to vote whom these officers in their discretion should decide has the right to vote. These Federal officers of elections will count the votes and make certificates of election. Every Congressman and every Senator who holds a certificate of election will hold it at the hands of those Federal officers. If the State election should happen on the same day, under the State constitution, then the Federal officers could hold in their hands the election machinery and actually control our State elections.

I do not care who writes and makes the laws of a State if you will let me administer those laws. Gentlemen on the floor say that Congress can not fix the qualifications of voters. No; the State laws will do that. But who cares who makes the laws? It is a question of enforcement and administration. You leave the State the miserable privilege of writing her own statutes, but you degrade and humiliate her by depriving her of the right to have her own officers of her own elections to enforce these laws. You take away, or are, rather, asking each State to surrender her only shield and buckler. You would ask in this amendment that these States lie helpless and prostrate without a single weapon of defense against Federal encroachment. You say that Congress can now control, if it desires, the election of Congressmen, and that for that reason the States should now be stripped of all power of protection, and you would submit this amendment to them and ask them to throw themselves upon the mercy of Congress. Will they do it? Not if they understand the proposition.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. JACKSON. The gentleman does not believe it would be possible, and he does not advocate any change in the Constitution that would prevent the Senate from being the judge of the qualifications of its own Members, does he?

Mr. SISSON. Oh, no. I say this: I want the Senate to be the judge of its own election after the election is made and returned.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is extended five minutes.

Mr. JACKSON. Then the result would simply be that the Senate could keep out of its Chamber any man who was elected from any of those States, and there would not be any difficulty, would there, in denying the right of the State to representation at all in the Senate?

Mr. SISSON. I understand the gentleman's question, but the State would still have the sovereign right to send whom she pleased. But if this amendment were adopted her laws would be construed, we will say, by a Democratic majority, and the President of the United States, vested with authority to appoint these election officers, would construe the law of the States and would construe the qualifications of the electors of the States, and would determine who should and who should not vote, and you would thereby deprive the States of one of their sovereign prerogatives and powers which they now have.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SISSON. I do.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose a State or States refused to send Senators. Would not the Senate exist by virtue of some other authority than itself, and therefore——

Mr. SISSON. Yes; and at the very beginning of the Government—and I am sure the gentleman is familiar with it—there was a fear expressed in the debates of the Constitutional Convention to the effect that Senators would not be sent to the Senate and that Members of the House would not be sent to the House by their districts, and therefore, when they were discussing this matter in the original Constitutional Convention, they made this compromise, that the Federal Government might protect and preserve itself. But they did not go to the extent that some of the members of that convention desired to go at that time—notably those who followed Mr. Hamilton—to give the absolute right to the Federal Government to control absolutely the election of all Federal officers, but they got this compromise. They worked up a compromise, and my recollection is that Mr. Franklin, who was one of the great compromisers, evolved this plan and it finally went through.

Now, if you change this method, you would have the anomalous condition of one body politic making the law and another body politic construing or enforcing the law. Now, it would be in times of political storm—it would only be when the stress was great—that a Federal election law could ever be passed. Then, as in war, thousands of things that would not be tolerated in time of peace would be tolerated, and the purpose of this Constitution is to protect people in their rights in time of stress and storm.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. SISSON. I do.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does not the gentleman understand that the only effect of the adoption of this conference report, if it should become a part of the Constitution, would be in his own State to change the election of United States Senators from an election by the legislature to an election by the voters of the State?

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman knows little about the contention if he contends that, because, under the present Constitution, you can not reach the electorate by any act of Congress. You can not go back and lay violent hands on it. You can, so far as the House of Representatives is concerned. But a State, if it is denied the right to send Representatives to Congress, can still elect, under her own law and legislature, her Senators, and can send her Senators to the other end of the Capitol and there protect the State in its rights, and there become a check on the brutal majority of this House.

I recall how the people of the South prayed, when Mr. LODGE, of Massachusetts, introduced the force bill here, against its enactment. I recollect as a young man how we listened night and day at the telegraph office for news of the result. I recall how a Senator from my own State, who has passed away, Senator George, spoke for parts of three days against the bill; and I recollect how they telegraphed to Senator Stewart, and the wires were quivering and vibrating with the intelligence that Senator Stewart was on his way to the Capitol, although he left a sick bed at his home to come; and when Senator Stewart, under the influence of Gov. Foote's daughter—that good Mississippi woman who nursed him in his sickness—and who hurried on a special train from the West to this city and that great Republican when he reached the Senate cast his vote against the force bill and killed the force bill; and I recollect the rejoicing all over the South.

And let me say to you that since we have had honest and fair elections in the South my own State has had millions of dollars of northern capital invested within its boundaries, millions of dollars have gone into Mississippi, millions of dollars have been spent for land, and millions of dollars have been invested in timber and land by people from Illinois and Ohio and Indiana and all the principal Northern States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SISSON. I regret that I can not.

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman two minutes out of my time.

Mr. SISSON. With that understanding, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Missouri has agreed to yield to me time, and I ask him to give to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] two minutes out of the time promised to me.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Certainly; I will do that. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MANN. The Lodge bill, to which the gentleman referred, related to the election of Members of the House of Representatives, did it not?

Mr. SISSON. Only to Members of the House of Representatives; yes.

Mr. MANN. And this resolution, as passed by the House, does not propose to change that part at all, does it?

Mr. SISSON. No, sir.

Mr. MANN. So that even if the resolution should pass in the form in which the gentleman advocates it, the Lodge bill, if reenacted, would still be constitutional.

Mr. SISSON. It would be constitutional.

Mr. MANN. So that all the argument the gentleman makes about the Lodge bill falls to the ground, because no one is offering to change the constitutional authority which was behind the Lodge bill.

Mr. SISSON. But the point in the Lodge bill was that at that time it was killed in the Senate; but if the same majority could have controlled the Senate that controlled this House, then the same will and the political exigency would have existed there that existed here, and the result would have been that it would have become a law.

Mr. MANN. That would not make any difference. It is the question of power that the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. SISSON. Now, in concluding these remarks I want to say that if this amendment becomes a law, in time of stress and storm the desire to pass a Federal election bill will be multiplied tenfold, because then you can control both branches of Congress, whereas if you can only control one branch the passage of such a law would be remote, because under the present Constitution you could not affect the Senate by a force bill.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to my colleague from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN].

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I will occupy all the time which has been allotted to me, but I do want to make this observation: If there is any one thing that I think the people of the whole country, regardless of party, are demanding to-day, it is that United States Senators shall be elected by direct vote of the people. [Applause.] I think we can not be mistaken on that proposition.

This conference report is not as I would like to have it. I am sure it is not as the chairman of the committee in charge of this bill in the House would have liked to have had it, but I am sure that it is the very best that he could get. We can not shut our eyes to the fact that there is scarcely any legislation of a general nature that is not the result of a compromise, and I believe that the imagination of some gentlemen here, who pretend to see great evil to flow from this legislation, is not founded on real facts.

I yield to no man in this House in my admiration for the South. I was born there, and I lived there for several years of my life. My father was a Confederate soldier for four years, and lived in the South during the reconstruction period. I have heard him describe conditions there at that time, and have read of it, and naturally I have an abhorrence for the conditions that existed there at that time, but I am charitable enough to believe that every man on this floor, regardless of politics, agrees with me that such a condition could not again exist in this country. The people of the North would not tolerate it. I do not believe there is any danger of a return to that condition of things in this country. [Applause.] I do not believe that Members upon this floor, however strenuously they protest, believe, deep down in their hearts, that such a condition will again exist in the South. It seems to me that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] hit the nail on the head a few moments ago when he asked the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] if there was any interference now by the Federal Government in the election of Members of this House, or if he anticipated any interference, or felt that there might be any.

Mr. BARTLETT. If I may interrupt the gentleman, there is no interference now, because the law that authorized it was repealed in 1894.

Mr. HAMLIN. But the law that governs the election of Members to this House now will be the same law that will govern the election of United States Senators if this conference report is agreed to.

Then the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] asked the gentleman from Georgia, if that be true, why does he anticipate that any interference would be had in the election of Members of the other branch of Congress.

Mr. BARTLETT. If a Democratic majority pass this sort of a bill, there is no telling what a Republican majority may do.

Mr. HAMLIN. It seems to me this is a tempest in a teapot. All the change the Senate made in the resolution as it passed this House is the striking out of this one provision:

> That the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be prescribed in the several States by the legislatures thereof.

Otherwise the law is left as it exists to-day. Now, it is up to us. Do we want to give the people a chance to amend the Constitution so as to permit them to elect the Senators by a direct vote?

We can not deny the fact that the Senate has emphatically refused to submit this constitutional amendment in any other form than that reported in this conference report, and it is up to us to say whether or not we are going to yield to the demands of the people of this country and give the States an opportunity to adopt this amendment, if they want to adopt it, or refuse to agree to this conference report and thereby defeat the whole proposition. I am in favor of adopting this conference report. [Applause.]

Mr. FAISON. If the gentleman from Missouri is so much in favor of this resolution now, why did he go on record against it repeatedly in the last Congress?

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman certainly was not listening to the first part of my remarks, or he would know that I said I very much preferred the resolution as we passed it in the House, not so much on account of the difference in the provisions as that it left it absolutely clear, so that there could be no question about the right of the States to control these elections. I believe the States ought to have that right. I believe they will have the right under this amendment in case it is adopted, but if we could have gotten it through as we passed it in the House, then there could have been no question about it.

Mr. FAISON. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. FAISON. The gentleman well knows that the law is not a question of what he believes it is, but it is a question of what the law is. If the gentleman prefers to have it stay in——

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand the gentleman's question. It is more to satisfy just such friends as the gentleman from North Carolina is that I would like to have it as the House passed it, so that he could sleep well at night and not be uneasy.

Mr. FAISON. You admit that you much prefer this?

Mr. HAMLIN. I say I would prefer to have it pass just as we passed it in the House, so there would be no doubt about what it meant; but I do not share with the gentleman the fear that, in case this proposed amendment should become a part of the Constitution, there would be any interference by the Federal Government in the election of United States Senators. I want to say, so far as the South is concerned, and I say it to the everlasting credit of the South, that in the last few years the scandals that have arisen over the election of Members of the United States Senate have not originated in the Southern States, but have originated in the States of the North, which are not afraid of this resolution in its present form. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. COLLIER. The gentleman says that he is really in earnest in his desire to see Senators elected by direct vote of the people?

Mr. HAMLIN. I am.

Mr. COLLIER. Does not the gentleman know that this amendment was put on the bill for the absolute purpose of defeating the election of Senators by popular vote?

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not know that that was the purpose of the amendment, and I would hesitate to impugn the motives of the Senator who offered it. But if it was his purpose, it is in our power to fool him, and I hope that we will do so. I know very well if we fail to agree to this conference report that there will be no constitutional amendment providing for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people for years to come.

I am hoping that the good people of the Southern States will see that it is for their interest and the interest of the whole country—and they are patriotic—that this proposed amendment is written into the Constitution of the United States. When we do that the other body will be very much more responsive to the will and desires of the people than it is now.

Now, I hold no brief in defense of my colleague from Missouri, Judge RUCKER. He needs no defense; he is amply able to take care of himself. But I want to say, however, that I know from all that he has said on this floor and in private conversation that his desire and earnest wish has been to have the Senate agree to the resolution as it was passed by this House; this he was unable to accomplish, and he feels it his duty, and I think he is right, to the great body of the people in this country, who are the real authority—we are only the agents here to represent them—he believes that it is his duty to report here a resolution to be submitted to the States of the Union and give them the opportunity to amend the Constitution if they wish; and therefore he has made the motion that this conference report be agreed to.

You may criticize my colleague about changing his position upon this question, but we who know him know that he is only anxious to respond to the earnest desire of the people of the country for this reform, and when he can not get just what he wants he has the courage to take the best that he can get, and then take the people into his confidence and tell them that he did the best he could for them. We who know him do not doubt his good intentions, and the people of Missouri have confidence in him, and the people of this country will applaud him for what he has done. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, it is going to be determined to-day by this House whether a great reform long demanded by the American people is to be granted or not. The responsibility is not going to rest on the Senate. If it shall fail it will rest on this House. If it shall fail because of a lack of two-thirds vote the responsibility will not rest upon this side of the aisle to-day, but upon the other side of the aisle. I know that there are Members upon that side who propose to vote against the concurrence in the Senate amendment who believe that they can say to the American people that the Senate is to blame for the failure of this great reform. But, Mr. Speaker, it will not lie in the mouth of any Democratic Member to make such a charge, for the very purpose of this amendment—the reason for it—is that there is a conviction upon the part of the American people that the Senate does not represent the American people as it should, and you will not be able to go before the people and say "these men who are misrepresenting the American people are to blame because this resolution was not adopted."

There has been a great deal of debate upon the merits of this proposition, but I am not going to take any time upon it now. I do want to insert in the RECORD a short paragraph from the report of the constitutional convention which I have not heretofore seen used, and it is interesting. I quote from Madison's papers, page 813:

> Mr. Dickinson moved that Senators be chosen by the legislature. He said, as a reason, he wished the Senate to consist of men most distinguished for their rank in life and their weight of property and bearing as strong a likeness to the membership of the House of Lords as possible, and he thought such characters more likely to be selected by the State legislatures than in any other mode.

Mr. Speaker, there were prophets in those days. It will not do for anyone who votes to defeat this resolution to-day to say that this kind of men are to blame for the failure of it and not this House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] and those of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], and to hear these gentlemen, Mr. Speaker, one wonders whether in their minds the war is over or not. Why, Mr. Speaker, whenever anything like the statements that have been made here to-day are made in this House by Members on this side, they have been deprecated on that side of the House. Only the other day the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] quoted from a speech by Mr. Garfield, where reference was made to the late war, and he was immediately criticized on that side of the House. Mr. Speaker, who is raising the question of sectionalism now with reference to this resolution? If this resolution should be finally adopted, as you gentlemen want it adopted, that matter of sectionalism will become more or less of an issue in every State of the Union, and you men from the South will be responsible for it.

There is no such thing as sectionalism now. We have a united North and South, and I want to see it remain that way, and that is why I want to remove this question of sectionalism from this question and favor the motion of the gentleman from Missouri. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I regret to observe that distinguished gentlemen who on other subjects and other occasions exhibit considerable acumen appear at this time to be utterly unable or entirely unwilling to differentiate between the limited difficulty and danger of Federal interference with elections by State legislatures on the one hand, and the much dreaded and much more easy and infinitely more dangerous intermeddling with popular elections held in the States. That is the essential difference which appears to me plain enough for anybody to see between the two propositions before the House. I am perfectly satisfied with the existing provision of the Constitution as operating and intended to operate on elections by the legislature, but a radical change is proposed, which introduces new methods and invites new dangers. It is proposed that the Senators shall be chosen by direct vote of the people of the States, not of their own volition but by constitutional mandate. Those States which really desire the election of Senators by the people have provided for it by primary elections. Others, if they should come to desire it, could adopt the same method; but it is insisted that all States can not or will not do it, therefore it is necessary to change the plan through an amendment to the Constitution and compel all States to select Senators by popular election. We are willing to have that and have voted for it. The only condition we placed upon it was the fair and reasonable provision that the States should determine the time, place, and manner of election. The reasons for it were manifest in this House, which passed the measure with that qualification by an overwhelming majority. It is strange to me that the leaders in charge, who are now beating a retreat, should have persisted in that course if it was erroneous, thereby delaying action for a whole year. They say we were right and still protest that they desire the resolution in the form originally adopted by this House, but they say we are whipped, that we can not carry it our way, and that therefore we ought to surrender and vote with our opponents to put the wrong upon us. That is not my theory of waging war, practicing law, or practicing statesmanship. If wrong finally prevails over me I will probably submit after the die is cast, but I will never consent and contribute to my own destruction by voting with the other side to run over and demolish me. That would be a species of self-destruction bordering on suicide, of which I will never be guilty.

The Federal Government will never have constitutional authority to intermeddle with popular election of Senators in the States until the amendment is adopted. If we vote it down we may secure one in proper form, as we first adopted it. It is very poor tactics to dally along with the Senate and give them to understand, either expressly or tacitly, that if they do not yield we will. It is the fault of the Senate, aided by the vacillating weakness of our own leaders, if this resolution goes through in its amended form, which, in my judgment, will be infinitely worse than defeating the amendment. If we would defeat the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri and let the Senate know we mean it, the Senate will either recede and pass the unamended resolution now or leave the matter open, so that action can be secured in the future. I for one will not vote to foreclose the matter and pass thereby down to the States a resolution which, in its amended form, is a stultification of ourselves, an insult to American intelligence, a departure from American principles, and a dangerous experiment, fraught with possible calamity to our country and its institutions, nor are my apprehensions confined to my own section. The failure of reconstruction, the assertion of our manhood, and the survival of our civilization to illustrate Americanism in this country and ultimately dominate its statesmanship and civilization demonstrate the inability of Federal interference to hurt us. But there are States in this Union in which the character of the population and conditions in their large cities bid us sit up and take notice. They are now represented by men committing the fatal error of voting to bring upon them the evils which we seek to avert. I shall vote for the Bartlett resolution. Failing in that, I shall vote against the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri, leaving the field open for wiser and better action in the future, when wiser and better counsels prevail in both Houses. I fear that too much politics at this time imperils our safety.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON].

[Mr. DICKINSON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HAMILTON].

[Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, my good friend the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] and I generally find ourselves in agreement on questions touching the relative powers, jurisdiction, and sovereignty of the States and the Federal Government, but in the matter now before us I am unable to admit the soundness of his premises to follow his logic or agree with his conclusions.

The gentleman from Georgia prides himself on the jealous care with which he would guard the sovereignty of the people within the States. In that attitude I commend him and generally agree with him. But the difference between the gentleman from Georgia and myself seems to be that while I insist upon the maintenance of the division of authority, power, and responsibility established by the Constitution, and would maintain it as established, the gentleman from Georgia appears to be insistent that the balance established by the Constitution shall be modified and changed in the direction of enlarging the power and authority of the State and in the same degree curtailing the jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

The gentleman from Georgia may be able to persuade himself that this proposed amendment to the Constitution in the form before us would extend and enlarge the powers of the Federal Government, but I do not believe that he will be able to persuade any considerable number of people that such is the case. What the proposed amendment would accomplish, to wit, the election of Senators by popular vote, the people generally desire; and this is the only change in the Constitution, direct or indirect, which the measure as presented by the conferees would accomplish.

As modified by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia, this amendment to the Constitution, if adopted, would indeed give the people an opportunity to elect their Senators directly; but it would at the same time take from the Federal Government the authority it now has with respect to the election of Senators. Where my friend from Georgia and I part company, therefore, is at the point where he proposes to curtail the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. The Constitution as it stands, as the fathers drafted it, is in this respect good enough for me. The balance of power between the States and the Federal Government, as the fathers fixed it, is satisfactory to me; but the gentleman from Georgia, who in one breath talks eloquently of keeping the faith, in the very next breath would deny the faith by breaking the terms of the compact.

This is a very simple matter; the people throughout the country have expressed a desire to elect their Senators by direct popular vote. So strong is the sentiment in favor of such a plan that many States have sought to accomplish indirectly what could not be accomplished directly without a change in the Federal Constitution. In response to the demand, voiced from all portions of the country, Congress addressed itself to the consideration of an amendment which, if adopted, will give the people just what they seem to desire in this matter. No disturbance of the balance of sovereignty and jurisdiction between the States and the Federal Government is involved, or would have been thought of, except that certain gentlemen, who seem anxious to disturb and readjust the relations which the Constitution established between the Nation and the S ates, seem to feel that this was an opportune time to accomplish it; but, fortunately for the country, there is sufficient patriotism on both sides of the aisle to override a view which would deny the people the right to elect Senators by direct vote unless a further provision, which no considerable number of our people have ever demanded, should be agreed to.

Gentlemen will not succeed in their efforts to rehabilitate the thin and faded ghost of Federal interference with local election in connection with this matter. The people will not be deceived; they desire an opportunity to elect their Senators by direct vote, and their demand that they be given this opportunity has nowhere been coupled with a demand that at the same time the constitutional balance between the States and the Nation shall be disturbed. In my opinion, an attempt to deny the people that which they insist upon in connection with the election of Senators, on any such flimsy pretense, will be no more successful in Georgia or in Texas than in Wyoming or Massachusetts.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

[Mr. RAKER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON].

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of the general proposition. The evolution of political institutions requires that the Government should gradually come more and more to the people and come more and more under their direct control. That evolution has gone on in this country for over 100 years without any provision having been made in our organic law to meet it. It is my judgment that the time has come not only to put the second House of our legislative branch under the control of the people, but to put the executive branch, which is now two degrees removed, into the direct control of the hands of our people.

But I will not discuss that phase of the question. I am in favor of taking action now that will insure the submission of this amendment. [Applause.] The part of the amendment that provides for the qualifications of electors for Senators guarantees the complete control of the electors in each State by the State itself. [Applause.] That part of the bill is fundamental and protects the States against danger of Federal interference. The power of Congress to control the time, place, and manner of election is really only an incidental matter in comparison with the control of the qualifications of electors. I was in favor, and still am in favor, of the amendment in the form in which it was reported by the House, and I wish it could have been adopted in that form, but I do not believe that a question that is not fundamental should be allowed to endanger the ultimate passage of the measure. I want to say to my friends on this side of the House who are worried over the Bristow amendment that I feel deeply in this matter, and am in sympathy with them on the broad proposition of protecting the States in their rights, but I do not have any misgivings about the Federal Government of the United States imposing upon any section of the United States. [Applause.] I do not believe it will enter the heart of one American citizen in 10,000 to employ Federal troops, or any other form of coercion, upon any section in the United States. [Applause.] The Federal Government is nothing but an instrument of all the States, and the Southern States themselves make up a considerable part of the number of all the States.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is not the gentleman aware that the advocates of this particular amendment in the Senate stated that the purpose of the amendment was that the Congress should have the power to control the election laws of States such as the State of Alabama, that provided a grandfather clause in its election laws?

Mr. HOBSON. I will say to the gentleman that fortunately the wishes of such men did not ultimately prevail even in reconstruction days, and certainly could not prevail now. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. I will say to the gentleman, because Alabama, like Georgia and Mississippi, asserted her right to supremacy under the law and above the law.

Mr. HOBSON. I have confidence in all the American people to abide by the Constitution, and when this amendment, insuring to each State the right of imposing the qualifications of the electors, becomes a part of that organic law, no matter what might be the desires of individual Members of the other branch or of this branch for that matter, to the contrary, it would be physically impossible for the Federal Government——

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama one minute, in order to answer a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia yields to the gentleman one minute——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama five minutes additional.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has six minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. All right; I will yield him the minute; I will stand by what I said. Now, does not the gentleman know that the author of this particular amendment in the Senate, Senator BRISTOW, has stated that the purpose of the bill was to control the election of Senators in Congress, and he thought it did give the power to use the Federal Army and United States marshals at the polls?

Mr. HOBSON. I will answer the gentleman, and say that I am not acquainted with the personal wishes of Senator BRISTOW, whom the gentleman quoted, but I have been reliably informed by those in a position to know that the original purpose in refusing to accept the amendment on grounds held by the gentleman himself was to defeat the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Do you think Senator BRISTOW desired to defeat the bill?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BARTLETT. I beg the Chair's pardon, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HOBSON. I will very gladly yield, and I will let the gentleman assume that I yield at any time, Mr. Speaker, so the gentleman can proceed without loss of time.

Mr. BARTLETT. I apologize to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. No apology is necessary.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman believe that Senator BRISTOW offered this amendment for the purpose of defeating the election of United States Senators by the people?

Mr. HOBSON. On the contrary, I feel that Senator BRISTOW offered it in all good faith. [Applause.] But I have not the same confidence in the purposes of those who brought up the sectional matter [applause], with regard to the ultimate——

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman's information as to what the views and purposes of those who offered this matter are a matter of entire indifference to me; but the gentleman ought to know—or does he know—that Senator BRISTOW once, like the gentleman from Alabama, voted against this particular amendment.

Mr. HOBSON. I do not know what Senator BRISTOW's position is. I know that to-day, if there were a chance of having the amendment in the form in which it came from our committee, in which it passed the House, if there were any chance of having it in that form, and the price was voting against it in its present form, I would vote against it again in its present form. I prefer the form in which our committee reported it and which the House accepted, but that is not the real question now.

It is clearly a question of whether we will have it as it comes to us now or not have it at all. [Applause.] The gentleman refers to the power of the Federal Government to send troops, marshals, and others. That power will not be enhanced one jot or one tittle more than it exists to-day with regard to elections for Members of this House. I am not in favor of having the Government exercise such power. I do not even like the thought of the Government holding the power of imposing Federal restrictions of any kind upon the election machinery or upon the local institutions of the States, but holding this power is nothing new. The power has existed since this Government began in just as complete a form as it would exist when this amendment is adopted. In my judgment, the very surest way to prevent the exercise of such power is to accept the Senate amendment and place the Senate in the hands of the people. Then a generation would not elapse, as it has in this case, in getting the Senate to submit a legitimate reform demanded by the people. Then we might get an amendment that would take this power from the hands of the Government in respect to both Houses of Congress.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. I agree with the gentleman that there is not the remotest probability of Federal interference in elections. The time for that has long passed. But I do object to the statement so frequently indulged in here that the election of a United States Senator—and the gentleman himself intimated it—is an affair of a State alone. The title of a Senator is "Senator of the United States," from a State. A vote of a Senator from Alabama is as potent in my district in Wisconsin as is the vote of one of the Senators from the State of Wisconsin, and——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. COOPER. I ask that the gentleman have two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no control over the time.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I yield the gentleman two minutes additional.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri yields the gentleman from Alabama two minutes more.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, it is largely to answer the gentleman from Wisconsin that I accept this much indulgence. I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin in connection with my statement that, while I possess complete confidence in the United States, of which my State is a part, I believe the integrity, the prosperity, and the perpetuity of the United States depend more upon safeguarding the principle of local self-government in the individual States than upon any other principle of government. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri has used 44 minutes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART] five minutes.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker, this measure, prescribed in a disagreeable form, has been offered to this House as an amendment in the full faith and belief that it will not be adopted. It has been offered to the House as a disagreeable proposition. The election of United States Senators has been advocated by both parties in nearly every State in this Union. It has been voted in the Senate, and it has been voted in the House. We are all for it, and yet there is attached to it a sort of supervisory control by the United States Government that was deliberately intended to make it obnoxious to this House.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] has offered an amendment which will relieve it of that obnoxious feature. I will vote for that amendment; and should that amendment fail, I will vote for the Senate proposition of election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people.

Do you realize that the United States now has power to superintend the election of each one of us? That power was put into the Constitution by the framers of it. That power was exercised during what was called "reconstruction days," but in 1894 every statute having reference to the election of Members of Congress was deliberately abolished by both Houses of Congress.

And as a part of my remarks I now wish to call attention and ask leave to have incorporated in the RECORD the act of February 8, 1894, entitled:

An act to repeal all statutes relating to supervisors of elections and special deputy marshals, and for other purposes.

A comprehensive series of statutes was repealed by that act, and there now remains no act on the statute books of the United States regulating the election of Members of this House except the act that was passed a year ago requiring each of us to give an account of moneys expended in candidacies for nomination and election.

The following is the act of February 8, 1894, referred to:

[Act of Feb. 8, 1894, ch. 25, 28 Stat. L., 36.]

[SEC. 1.] [Election laws repealed—Election supervisors and special deputies abolished]: That the following sections and parts of sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same are hereby, repealed; that is to say, of title "Elective franchise," sections 2002, 2005, 2006, 2007, 2008, 2009, 2010, 2011, 2012, 2013, 2014, 2015, 2016, 2017, 2018, 2019, 2020, relating to the appointment, qualification, power, duties, and compensation of supervisors of election; and also sections 2021, 2022, 2023, 2024, 2025, 2026, 2027, 2028, 2029, 2030, 2031, of same title, relating to the appointment, qualification, power, duties, and compensation of special deputies; and also of title "Crimes," sections 5506, 5511, 5512, 5513, 5514, 5515, 5520, 5521, 5522, 5523, but the repeal of the sections hereinbefore mentioned shall not operate so as to affect any prosecutions now pending, if any, for a violation of any of the provisions of said sections; and also part of section 643, as follows: "Or is commenced against any officer of the United States or other person on account of any act done under the provisions of title 26, 'The elective franchise,' or on account of any right, title, or authority claimed by any officer or other person under any of said provisions." (28 Stat. L., 36.)

Revised Statutes, section 643, above referred to, relates to the removal of causes from State to Federal courts against United States officers acting under color of office. See Judiciary.

The sections of the Revised Statutes repealed by the above section are set out in the notes following section 3 of this act.

SEC. 2. [General repeal]: That all other statutes and parts of statutes relating in any manner to supervisors of election and special deputy marshals be, and the same are hereby, repealed. (28 Stat. L., 37.)

SEC. 3. [When act takes effect]: That this act shall take effect from and after its passage. (28 Stat. L., 37.)

Election supervisors and special deputy marshals abolished—Repealed sections of Revised Statutes.—The following are the sections of the Revised Statutes repealed by this act:

"SEC. 2002. No military or naval officer or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls." (Act of Feb. 25, 1865, ch. 52, 13 Stat. L., 437.)

"SEC. 2005. When, under the authority of the constitution or laws of any State or the laws of any Territory, any act is required to be done as a prerequisite or qualification for voting, and by such constitution or laws persons or officers are charged with the duty of furnishing to citizens an opportunity to perform such prerequisite or to become qualified to vote, every such person and officer shall give to all citizens of the United States the same and equal opportunity to perform such prerequisite and to become qualified to vote." (Act of May 31, 1870, ch. 114, 16 Stat. L., 140.)

"SEC. 2006. Every person or officer charged with the duty specified in the preceding section, who refuses or knowingly omits to give full effect to that section, shall forfeit the sum of $500 to the party aggrieved by such refusal or omission, to be recovered by an action on the case, with costs, and such allowance for counsel fees as the court may deem just." (Act of May 31, 1870, ch. 114, 16 Stat. L., 140.)

"SEC. 2007. Whenever under the authority of the constitution or laws of any State, or the laws of any Territory, any act is required to be done by a citizen as a prerequisite to qualify or entitle him to vote, the offer of such citizen to perform the act required to be done, shall, if it fail to be carried into execution by reason of the wrongful act or omission of the person or officer charged with the duty of receiving or permitting such performance or offer to perform, or acting thereon, be deemed and held as a performance in law of such act; and the person so offering and failing to vote and being otherwise qualified shall be entitled to vote in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had, in fact, performed such act." (Act of May 31, 1870, ch. 114, 16 Stat. L., 140.)

"SEC. 2008. Every judge, inspector, or other officer of election whose duty it is to receive, count, certify, register, report, or give effect to the vote of such citizen, who wrongfully refuses or omits to receive, account, certify, register, report, or give effect to the vote of such citizen upon the presentation by him of his affidavit, stating such offer and the time and place thereof, and the name of the officer or person whose duty it was to act thereon, and that he was wrongfully prevented by such person or officer from performing such act, shall forfeit the sum of $500 to the party aggrieved by such refusal or omission, to be recovered by an action on the case, with costs, and such allowance for counsel fees as the court may deem just." (Act of May 31, 1870, ch. 114, 16 Stat. L., 140.)

"SEC. 2009. Every officer or other person, having powers or duties of an official character to discharge under any of the provisions of this title, who by threats or any unlawful means hinders, delays, prevents, or obstructs, or combines and confederates with others to hinder, delay, prevent, or obstruct any citizen from doing any act required to be done to qualify him to vote, or from voting at any election in any State, Territory, district, county, city, parish, township, school district, municipality, or other territorial subdivision, shall forfeit the sum of $500 to the person aggrieved thereby, to be recovered by an action on the case, with costs, and such allowance for counsel fees as the court may deem just." (Act of May 31, 1870, ch. 114, 16 Stat. L., 141; act of June 10, 1872, ch. 415, 17 Stat. L., 349.)

"SEC. 2010. Whenever any person is defeated or deprived of his election to any office, except elector of President or Vice President, Representative or Delegate in Congress, or member of a State legislature, by reason of the denial to any citizen who may offer to vote of the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, his right to hold and enjoy such office and the emoluments thereof shall not be impaired by such denial; and the person so defeated or deprived may bring any appropriate suit or proceeding to recover possession of such office, and in cases where it appears that the sole question touching the title to such office arises out of the denial of the right to vote to citizens who so offered to vote, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, such suit or proceeding may be instituted in the circuit or district court of the United States of the circuit or district in which such person resides. And the circuit or district court shall have, concurrently with the State courts, jurisdiction thereof, so far as to determine the rights of the parties to such office by reason of the denial of the right guaranteed by the fifteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and secured herein." (Act of May 31, 1870, ch. 114, 16 Stat. L., 146.)

"SEC. 2011. Whenever, in any city or town having upward of 20,000 inhabitants, there are 2 citizens thereof, or whenever, in any county or parish, in any congressional district, there are 10 citizens thereof, of good standing, who, prior to any registration of voters for an election for Representative or Delegate in the Congress of the United States, or prior to any election at which a Representative or Delegate in Congress is to be voted for, may make known, in writing, to the judge of the circuit court of the United States for the circuit wherein such city or town, county or parish, is situated, their desire to have such registration, or such election, or both, guarded and scrutinized, the judge, within not less than 10 days prior to the registration, if one there be, or, if no registration be required, within not less than 10 days prior to the election, shall open the circuit court at the most convenient point in the circuit." (Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 433; act of June 10, 1872, ch. 415, 17 Stat. L., 348.)

"SEC. 2012. The court, when so opened by the judge, shall proceed to appoint and commission, from day to day and from time to time, and under the hand of the judge, and under the seal of the court, for each election district or voting precinct in such city or town, or for such election district or voting precinct in the congressional district, as may have applied in the manner hereinbefore prescribed, and to revoke, change, or renew such appointment from time to time, two citizens, residents of the city or town, or of the election district or voting precinct in the county or parish, who shall be of different political parties, and able to read and write the English language, and who shall be known and designated as supervisors of election." (Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 433; act of June 10, 1872, ch. 415, 17 Stat. L., 348.

"SEC. 2013. The circuit court, when opened by the judge as required in the two preceeding sections, shall therefrom and thereafter, and up to and including the day following the day of election, be always open for the transaction of business under this title, and the powers and jurisdiction hereby granted and conferred shall be exercised as well in vacation as in term time; and a judge sitting at chambers shall have the same powers and jurisdiction, including the power of keeping order and of punishing any contempt of his authority, as when sitting in court." (Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 433; act of June 10, 1872, ch. 415, 17 Stat. L., 348.)

"SEC. 2014. Whenever, from any cause, the judge of the circuit court in any judicial circuit is unable to perform and discharge the duties herein imposed, he is required to select and assign to the performance thereof, in his place, such one of the judges of the district courts within his circuit as he may deem best; and upon such selection and assignment being made, the district judge so designated shall perform and discharge, in the place of the circuit judge, all the duties, powers, and obligations imposed and conferred upon the circuit judge by the provisions hereof." (Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 434.)

"SEC. 2015. The preceding section shall be construed to authorize each of the judges of the circuit courts of the United States to designate one or more of the judges of the district courts within his circuit to discharge the duties arising under this title." (Act of June 10, 1872, ch. 415, 17 Stat. L., 349.)

"SEC. 2016. The supervisors of election so appointed are authorized and required to attend at all times and places fixed for the registration of voters, who, being registered, would be entitled to vote for a Representative or Delegate in Congress, and to challenge any person offering to register; to attend at all times and places when the names of registered voters may be marked for challenge, and to cause such names registered as they may deem proper to be so marked; to make, when required, the lists, or either of them, provided for in section 2026, and verify the same; and upon any occasion, and at any time when in attendance upon the duty herein prescribed, to personally inspect and scrutinize such registry, and for purposes of identification to affix their signature to each page of the original list, and of each copy of any such list of registered voters, at such times, upon each day when any name may be received, entered, or registered, and in such manner as will, in their judgment, detect and expose the improper or wrongful removal therefrom, or addition thereto, of any name." (Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 434.)

"SEC. 2017. The supervisors of election are authorized and required to attend at all times and places for holding elections of Representatives or Delegates in Congress, and for counting the votes cast at such elections; to challenge any vote offered by any person whose legal qualifications the supervisors, or either of them, may doubt; to be and remain where the ballot boxes are kept at all times after the polls are open until every vote cast at such time and place has been counted, the canvass of all votes polled wholly completed, and the proper and requisite certificates or returns made, whether the certificates or returns be required under any law of the United States, or any State, Territorial, or municipal law, and to personally inspect any [and] scrutinize, from time to time, and at all times, on the day of election, the manner in which the voting is done, and the way and method in which the poll books, registry lists, and tallies or check books, whether the same are required by any law of the United States, or any State, Territorial, or municipal law, are kept." (Act of Feb. 8, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 434.)

"SEC. 2018. To the end that each candidate for the office of Representative or Delegate in Congress may obtain the benefit of every vote for him cast, the supervisors of election are, and each of them is, required to personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot in their election district or voting precinct cast, whatever may be the indorsement on the ballot, or in whatever box it may have been placed or be found; to make and forward to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they may serve, acts, such certificates and returns of all such ballots as such officer may direct and require, and to attach to the registry list, and any and all copies thereof and to any certificate, statement, or return, whether the same, or any part or portion thereof, be required by any law of the United States, or of any State, Territorial, or municipal law, any statement touching the truth or accuracy of the registry, or the truth or fairness of the election and canvass, which the supervisors of the election, or either of them, may desire to make or attach, or which should properly and honestly be made or attached, in order that the facts may become known." (Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 434.)

"SEC. 2019. The better to enable the supervisors of election to discharge their duties, they are authorized and directed, in their respective election districts or voting precincts, on the day of registration, on the day when registered voters may be marked to be challenged, and on the day of election, to take, occupy, and remain in such position, from time to time, whether before or behind the ballot boxes, as will, in their judgment, best enable them to see each person offering himself for registration or offering to vote, and as will best conduce to their scrutinizing the manner in which the registration or voting is being conducted; and at the closing of the polls for the reception of votes they are required to place themselves in such position, in relation to the ballot boxes, for the purpose of engaging in the work of canvassing the ballots, as will enable them to fully perform the duties in respect to such canvass provided herein, and shall there remain until every duty in respect to such canvass, certificates, returns, and statements has been wholly completed." (Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 435.)

"SEC. 2020. When in any election district or voting precinct in any city or town, for which there have been appointed supervisors of election for any election at which a Representative or Delegate in Congress is voted for, the supervisors of election are not allowed to exercise and discharge, fully and freely, and without bribery, solicitation, interference, hindrance, molestation, violence, or threats thereof, on the part of any person, all the duties, obligations, and powers conferred upon them by law, the supervisors of election shall make prompt report, under oath, within 10 days after the day of election to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they served, acts, of the manner and means by which they were not so allowed to fully and freely exercise and discharge the duties and obligations required and imposed herein. And upon receiving any such report, the chief supervisor, acting both in such capacity and officially as a commissioner of the circuit court, shall forthwith examine into all the facts; and he shall have power to subpœna and compel the attendance before him of any witness, and to administer oaths and take testimony in respect to the charges made; and, prior to the assembling of the Congress for which any such Representative or Delegate was voted for, he shall file with the Clerk of the House of Representatives all the evidence by him taken, all information by him obtained, and all reports to him made." (Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 435.)

"SEC. 2021. Whenever an election at which Representatives or Delegates in Congress are to be chosen is held in any city or town of 20,000 inhabitants or upward, the marshal for the district in which the city or town is situated shall, on the application, in writing, of at least two citizens residing in such city or town, appoint special deputy marshals, whose duty it shall be, when required thereto, to aid and assist the supervisors of election in the verification of any list of persons who may have registered or voted; to attend in each election district or voting precinct at the times and places fixed for the registration of voters, and at all times or places when and where the registration may by law be scrutinized, and the names of registered voters be marked for challenge; and also to attend, at all times for holding elections, the polls in such district or precinct." (Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 436.)

"SEC. 2022. The marshal and his general deputies, and such special deputies, shall keep the peace, and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, and immediately, either at the place of registration or polling place, or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States; but no person shall be arrested without process for any offense not committed in the presence of the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, or of the supervisors of election, or either of them, and, for the purposes of arrest or the preservation of the peace, the supervisors of election shall, in the absence of the marshal's deputies, or if required to assist such deputies, have the same duties and powers as deputy marshals; nor shall any person, on the day of such election, be arrested without process for any offense committed on the day of registration." (Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 436.)

"SEC. 2023. Whenever any arrest is made under any provision of this title, the person so arrested shall forthwith be brought before a commissioner, judge, or court of the United States for examination of the offenses alleged against him; and such commissioner, judge, or court shall proceed in respect thereto as authorized by law in case of crimes against the United States." (Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 436.)

"SEC. 2024. The marshal or his general deputies, or such special deputies as are thereto specially empowered by him, in writing, and under his hand and seal, whenever he or either or any of them is forcibly resisted in executing their duties under this title, or shall, by violence, threats, or menaces, be prevented from executing such duties, or from arresting any person who has committed any offense for which the marshal or his general or his special deputies are authorized to make such arrest, are, and each of them is, empowered to summon and call to his aid the bystanders or posse comitatus of his district." (Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 437.)

"SEC. 2025. The circuit courts of the United States for each judicial circuit shall name and appoint, on or before the 1st day of May, in the year 1871, and thereafter as vacancies may from any cause arise, from among the circuit court commissioners for each judicial district in each judicial circuit, one of such officers, who shall be known for the duties required of him under this title as the chief supervisor of elections of the judicial district for which he is a commissioner, and shall, so long as faithful and capable, discharge the duties in this title imposed." (Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 437.)

"SEC. 2026. The chief supervisor shall prepare and furnish all necessary books, forms, blanks, and instructions for the use and direction of the supervisors of election in the several cities and towns in their respective districts; he shall receive the applications of all parties for appointment to such positions; upon the opening, as contemplated in section 2012, of the circuit court for the judicial circuit in which the commissioner so designated acts, he shall present such applications to the judge thereof, and furnish information to him in respect to the appointment by the court of such supervisors of elections; he shall require of the supervisors of election, when necessary, lists of the persons who may register and vote, or either, in their respective election districts or voting precincts, and cause the names of those upon any such list whose right to register or vote is honestly doubted to be verified by proper inquiry and examination at the respective places by them assigned as their residences; and he shall receive, preserve, and file all oaths of office of supervisors of election, and of all special deputy marshals appointed under the provisions of this title, and all certificates, returns, reports, and records of every kind and nature contemplated or made requisite by the provisions hereof, save where otherwise herein specially directed." (Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 437.)

"SEC. 2027. All United States marshals and commissioners who in any judicial district perform any duties under the preceding provisions relating to, concerning, or affecting the election of Representatives or Delegates in the Congress of the United States, from time to time, and, with all due diligence, shall forward to the chief supervisor in and for their judicial district, all complaints, examinations, and records pertaining thereto, and all oaths of office by them administered to any supervisor of election or special deputy marshal, in order that the same may be properly preserved and filed." (Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 437.)

"SEC. 2028. No person shall be appointed a supervisor of election or a deputy marshal, under the preceding provisions, who is not, at the time of his appointment, a qualified voter of the city, town, county, parish, election district, or voting precinct in which his duties are to be performed." (Act of June 10, 1872, ch. 415, 17 Stat. L., 349.)

"SEC. 2029. The supervisors of election appointed for any county or parish in any congressional district, at the instance of 10 citizens, as provided in section 2011, shall have no authority to make arrests, or to perform other duties than to be in the immediate presence of the officers holding the election, and to witness all their proceedings, including the counting of the votes and the making of a return thereof." (Act of June 10, 1872, ch. 415, 17 Stat. L., 349.)

"SEC. 2030. Nothing in this title shall be construed to authorize the appointment of any marshals or deputy marshals in addition to those authorized by law, prior to the 10th day of June, 1872." (Act of June 10, 1872, ch. 415, 17 Stat. L., 349.)

"SEC. 2031. There shall be allowed and paid to the chief supervisor, for his services as such officer, the following compensation, apart from and in excess of all fees allowed by law for the performance of any duty as circuit court commissioner: For filing and caring for every return, report, record, document, or other paper required to be filed by him under any of the preceding provisions, 10 cents; for affixing a seal to any paper, record, report, or instrument, 20 cents; for entering and indexing the records of his office, 15 cents per folio; and for arranging and transmitting to Congress, as provided for in section 2020, any report, statement, record, return, or examination, for each folio, 15 cents; and for any copy thereof, or of any paper on file, a like sum. And there shall be allowed and paid to each supervisor of election, and each special deputy marshal who is appointed and performs his duty under the preceding provisions, compensation at the rate of $5 per day for each day he is actually on duty, not exceeding 10 days; but no compensation shall be allowed, in any case, to supervisors of election, except to those appointed in cities or towns of 20,000 or more inhabitants. And the fees of the chief supervisors shall be paid at the Treasury of the United States, such accounts to be made out, verified, examined, and certified as in the case of accounts of commissioners, save that the examination or certificate required may be made by either the circuit or district judge." (Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 438; act of June 10, 1872, ch. 415, 17 Stat. L., 349.)

hinder, delay, prevent, or obstruct, any citizen from doing any act required to be done to qualify him to vote, or from voting at any election in any State, Territory, district, county, city, parish, township, school district, municipality, or other territorial subdivision, shall be fined not less than $500, or be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than one year, or be punished by both such fine and imprisonment." (Act of May 31, 1870, ch. 114, 16 Stat. L., 141.)

"SEC. 5511. If, at any election for Representative or Delegate in Congress, any person knowingly personates and votes, or attempts to vote, in the name of any other person, whether living, dead, or fictitious; or votes more than once at the same election for any candidate for the same office; or votes at a place where he may not be lawfully entitled to vote; or votes without having a lawful right to vote; or does any unlawful act to secure an opportunity to vote for himself, or any other person; or by force, threat, intimidation, bribery, reward, or offer thereof, unlawfully prevents any qualified voter of any State, or of any Territory, from freely exercising the right of suffrage, or by any such means induces any voter to refuse to exercise such right, or compels, or induces, by any such means, any officer of an election in any such State or Territory to receive a vote from a person not legally qualified or entitled to vote; or interferes in any manner with any officer of such election in the discharge of his duties; or by any such means, or other unlawful means, induces any officer of an election or officer whose duty it is to ascertain, announce, or declare the result of any such election, or give or make any certificate, document, or evidence in relation thereto, to violate or refuse to comply with his duty or any law regulating the same; or knowingly receives the vote of any person not entitled to vote, or refuses to receive the vote of any person entitled to vote, or aids, counsels, procures, or advises any such voter, person, or officer to do any act hereby made a crime, or omit to do any duty the omission of which is hereby made a crime, or attempts to do so, he shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500, or by imprisonment not more than three years, or by both, and shall pay the costs of the prosecution." If, at any registration of voters for an election for Representative or Delegate in the Congress of the United States, any person knowingly personates and registers, or attempts to register, in the name of any other person, whether living, dead, or fictitious, or fraudulently registers, or fraudulently attempts to register, not having a lawful right so to do; or does any unlawful act to secure registration for himself or any other person; or by force, threat, menace, intimidation, bribery, reward, or offer, or promise thereof, or other unlawful means, prevents or hinders any person having a lawful right to register from duly exercising such right; or compels or induces by any of such means, or other unlawful means, any officer of registration to admit to registration any person not legally entitled thereto, or interferes in any manner with any officer of registration in the discharge of his duties, or by any such means, or other unlawful means, induces any officer of registration to violate or refuse to comply with his duty or any law regulating the same; or if any such officer knowingly and willfully registers as a voter any person not entitled to be registered, or refuses to so register any person entitled to be registered; or if any such officer or other person who has any duty to perform in relation to such registration or election, in ascertaining, announcing, or declaring the result thereof, or in giving or making any certificate, document, or evidence in relation thereto, knowingly neglects or refuses to perform any duty required by law, or violates any duty imposed by law, or does any act unauthorized by law relating to or affecting such registration or election, or the result thereof, or any certificate, document, or evidence in relation thereto, or if any person aids, counsels, procures, or advises any such voter, person, or officer to do any act hereby made a crime, or to omit any act the omission of which is hereby made a crime, every such person shall be punishable as prescribed in the preceding section." (Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 433; act of May 31, 1870, ch. 114, 16 Stat. L., 145.)

"SEC. 5515. Every officer of an election at which any Representative or Delegates in Congress is voted for, whether such officer of election be appointed or created by or under any law or authority of the United States, or by or under any State, Territorial, district, or municipal law or authority, who neglects or refuses to perform any duty in regard to such election required of him by any law of the United States, or of any State or Territory thereof; or who violates any duty so imposed; or who knowingly does any acts thereby unauthorized, with intent to affect any such election, or the result thereof; or who fraudulently makes any false certificate of the result of such election in regard to such Representative or Delegate; or who withholds, conceals, or destroys any certificate of record so required by law respecting the election of any such Representative or Delegate; or who neglects or refuses to make and return such certificate as required by law; or who aids, counsels, procures, or advises any voter, person, or officer to do any act by this or any of the preceding sections made a crime, or to omit to do any duty the omission of which is by this or any of such sections made a crime, or attempts to do so, shall be punished as prescribed in section 5511." (Act of May 31, 1870, ch. 114, 16 Stat. L., 145.)

"SEC. 5520. If two or more persons in any State or Territory conspire to prevent by force, intimidation, or threat any citizen who is lawfully entitled to vote from giving his support or advocacy, in a legal manner, toward or in favor of the election of any lawfully qualified person as an elector for President or Vice President, or as a Member of the Congress of the United States, or to injure any citizen in person or property on account of such support or advocacy, each of such persons shall be punished by a fine of not less than five hundred nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, not less than six months nor more than six years, or by both such fine and imprisonment." "SEC. 5522. Every person, whether with or without any authority, power, or process, or pretended authority, power, or process, of any State, Territory, or municipality, who obstructs, hinders, assaults, or by bribery, solicitation, or otherwise interferes with or prevents the supervisors of election, or either of them, or the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of any duty required of them, or either of them, or which he or they, or either of them, may be authorized to perform by any law of the United States, in the execution of process or otherwise, or who by any of the means before mentioned hinders or perverts the free attendance and presence at such places of registration or at such polls of election, or full and free access and egress to and from any such place of registration or poll of election, or in going to and from any such place of registration or poll of election, or to and from any room where any such registration or election or canvass of votes, or of making any returns or certificates thereof, may be had, or who molests, interferes with, removes, or ejects from any such place of registration or poll of election, or of canvassing votes cast thereat, or of making returns or certificates thereof, any supervisor of election, the marshal, or his general or special deputies, or either of them; or who threatens, or attempts, or offers so to do, or refuses or neglects to aid and assist any supervisor of election, or the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of his or their duties, when required by him or them, or either of them, to give such aid and assistance, shall be liable to instant arrest without process, and shall be punished by imprisonment not more than two years or by a fine of not more than $3,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and shall pay the cost of the prosecution." (Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 436.)

"SEC. 5523. Every person who, during the progress of any verification of any list of the persons who may have registered or voted, which is had or made under any of the provisions of title 'The elective franchise,' refuses to answer, or refrains from answering, or, answering, knowingly gives false information in respect to any inquiry lawfully made, shall be punishable by imprisonment for not more than 30 days, or by a fine of not more than $100, or by both, and shall pay the costs of the prosecution." (Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. L., 437.)

I believe in the common sense of the American people. I do not believe that the apprehensions of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] are justified. I do not believe——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART] has expired.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker, I ask for two minutes more.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, how much time has the gentleman used?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. TAGGART. In the brief time allowed to me, I want to call attention to section 4 of the Constitution, as follows:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators. (Const., I, 4.)

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members. (Const., I, 5.)

And in conclusion I wish especially to call attention to chapter 13 of the Autobiography of Senator Hoar, in which that late distinguished and beloved Senator called attention to an act that was proposed to regulate elections in the United States and what became of it.

CHAPTER 13.

THE FEDERAL ELECTIONS BILL.

In December, 1889, the Republican Party succeeded to the legislative power in the country for the first time in 16 years. Since 1873 there had been a Democratic President for four years, and a Democratic House or Senate or both for the rest of the time. There was a general belief on the part of the Republicans that the House of Representatives, as constituted for 14 years of that time, and that the Presidency itself when occupied by Mr. Cleveland, represented nothing but usurpation, by which, in large districts of the country, the will of the people had been defeated. There were some faint denials at the time when these claims were made in either House of Congress as to elections in the Southern States. But nobody seems to deny now that the charges were true. Mr. Senator TILLMAN, of South Carolina, stated in my hearing in the Senate:

"We took the Government away. We stuffed ballot boxes. We shot them. We are not ashamed of it. The Senator from Wisconsin would have done the same thing. I see it in his eye right now. He would have done it. With that system—force, tissue ballots, etc.—we got tired ourselves. So we called a constitutional convention, and we eliminated, as I said, all of the colored people whom we could under the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments.

"I want to call your attention to the remarkable change that has come over the spirit of the dream of the Republicans; to remind you, gentlemen of the North, that your slogans of the past—brotherhood of man and fatherhood of God—have gone glimmering down the ages. The brotherhood of man exists no longer, because you shoot negroes in Illinois, when they come in competition with your labor, and we shoot them in South Carolina, when they come in competition with us in the matter of elections. You do not love them any better than we do. You used to pretend that you did; but you no longer pretend it, except to get their votes.

"You deal with the Filipinos just as you deal with the negroes, only you treat them a heap worse."

No Democrat rose to deny his statement, and, so far as I know, no Democratic paper contradicted it. The Republicans, who had elected President Harrison and a Republican House in 1888, were agreed, with very few exceptions, as to the duty of providing a remedy for this great wrong. Their presidential convention, held at Chicago in 1888, passed a resolution demanding, "effective legislation to secure integrity and purity of elections, which are the fountains of all public authority," and charged that the "present administration and the Democratic majority in Congress owe their existence to the suppression of the ballot by a criminal nullification of the Constitution and the laws of the United States."

In the Senate at the winter session of 1888 and at the beginning of the December session of 1889, a good many bills were introduced for the security of national elections. Similar bills were introduced in the House. A special committee was appointed there to deal with that subject. I had, myself, no doubt of the constitutional authority of Congress, and of its duty, if it were able, to pass an effective law for that purpose.

I was the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Eelections, and it was my duty to give special attention to that subject. I had carefully prepared a bill in the vacation, based on one introduced by Mr. Sherman, providing for holding, under national authority, separate registrations and elections for Members of Congress. But when I got to Washington, I found, on consultation with every Republican Senator except one, that a large majority were averse to an arrangement which would double the cost of elections throughout the country, and which, in States where personal registration every year is required, would demand from every citizen his presence at the place of polling or registration four times every alternate year. That is, in the years when there were Congressmen to be elected he must go twice to be registered—once for the State election, and once for the congressional—and twice to vote. So I drew another bill. I say I drew it. But I had the great advantage of consultation with Senator Spooner of Wisconsin, a very able lawyer who had lately come to the Senate, and I can hardly say that the bill, as it was finally drafted, was more mine or his. This bill provided, in substance, that there should be national officers of both parties who should be present at the registration and election of Members of Congress, and at the count of the vote, and who should know and report everything which should happen, so that all facts affecting the honesty of the election and the return might be before the House of Representatives. To this were added some sections providing for the punishment of bribery, fraud, and misconduct of election officers.

In the meantime the House of Representatives had appointed a special committee charged with a similar duty. Members of that committee saw me and insisted, with a good deal of reason, that a measure which concerned the election of Members of the House of Representatives should originate in that body. Accordingly the Senate committee held back its bill and awaited the action of the House, which sent a bill to the Senate, July 15, 1890. The House bill dealt not only with the matter of election, but also with the selection of juries, and some other important kindred subjects. Our committee struck out from it everything that did not bear directly on elections; mitigated the severity of the penalties, and reduced the bulk of the bill very considerably. The measure was reported in a new draft by way of substitute. It remained before the Senate until the beginning of the next session, when it was taken up for action. It was a very simple measure.

It only extended the law which, with the approbation of both parties, had been in force in cities of more than 20,000 inhabitants, to congressional districts, when there should be an application to the court, setting forth the necessity for its protection. That law had received the commendation of many leading Democrats, including S. S. Cox, Secretary Whitney, the four Democratic Congressmen who represented Brooklyn, and Gen. Slocum, then Representative at large from the State of New York. It had been put in force on the application of Democrats quite as often as on that of Republicans. We added to our bill a provision that in case of a dispute concerning an election certificate, the circuit court of the United States in which the district was situated should hear the case and should award a certificate entitling the Members to be placed on the clerk's roll, and to hold his seat until the House itself should act on the case. That provision was copied from the English law of 1868, which has given absolute public satisfaction there. This was the famous force bill, and the whole of it—a provision that, if a sufficient petition were made to the court for that purpose, officers appointed by the court, belonging to both parties should be present and watch the election; that the judge of the circuit court should determine, in case of dispute, what name should be put on the roll of the House of Representatives, in the beginning, subject to the constitutional power of the House to correct it, and that a moderate punishment for bribery, intimidation, and fraud, on indictment and conviction by a jury of the vicinage, should be imposed. That was the whole of it.

But the southern Democratic leaders with great adroitness proceeded to repeat the process known as "firing the southern heart." They persuaded their people that there was an attempt to control elections by national authority. They realized that the waning power of their party at the South—many of whose business men saw that the path of prosperity for the South as well as for the North lay in the adoption of Republican policies—might be reestablished by exciting the fear of negro domination. The northern Democrats, either very ignorantly or willfully, united in the outcry. Gov. William E. Russell, of Massachusetts, a gentleman of large influence and popularity with both parties, telegraphed to President Cleveland a pious thanksgiving for the defeat of this "wicked bill."

Some worthy Republican Senators became alarmed. They thought, with a good deal of reason, that it was better to allow existing evils and conditions to be cured by time and the returning conscience and good sense of the people rather than have the strife, the result of which must be quite doubtful, which the enactment and enforcement of this law, however moderate and just, would inevitably create.

On reflection I came myself to the conclusion that while the bill was reasonable and there was no reasonable doubt of the power of Congress to enact it, yet the attempt to pass it if it were to fail would do the cause infinite mischief. It would be an exhibition of impotence, always injurious to a political party. It would drive back into the Democratic Party many men who were afraid of negro domination, who looked with great dislike on the assertion of national power over elections, and whom other considerations would induce to act with the Republicans. So I thought it was best to ascertain carefully the prevailing opinion and see if we were likely to get the bill through, and if we found that unlikely not to proceed far enough to have a debate in either House.

Accordingly I visited the House of Representatives, saw several of my Massachusetts colleagues and some other leaders. They agreed that if I found that the bill could not in all probability pass the Senate it should be arranged to lay it aside in the House without making any serious movement for it there. After that arrangement was made there was a Senate caucus. I brought up the matter and moved the appointment of a committee to consider the whole question of legislation with reference to the security of elections. A gentleman who had recently become a Member of the Senate rose and quite angrily objected to taking up the matter for consideration. He declared that he would not consent to have the subject introduced in a Republican caucus. The proceedings of such caucuses are supposed to be kept from the public. But they are pretty sure to leak out. I could not very well get up and say that my reason for asking for a committee was to see whether the law should be suppressed or not. So I did not urge my motion. But I did the best I could.

Before reporting the bill I saw every Republican Senator and obtained his opinion upon it. I have in my possession the original memoranda of the various answers. Not only a majority of the Republican Senators, but a majority of the whole Senate declared emphatically for an election bill. I further consulted them whether the authority, in case of a disputed election, to order, upon hearing, the name of the person found to be elected to be placed on the roll should be lodged in the United States courts or in some special tribunal. Two or three preferred that the court should not be invoked. But a majority of the whole Senate favored vesting the power in the courts, and those who preferred another way stated that they were willing to abide by the judgment of the committee.

When the House bill came up it was, on the 7th of August, 1890, reported favorably with my bill as a substitute. Meantime the McKinley tariff bill, which Mr. Cleveland had made, so far as he could, the sole issue in the late election, had been matured and reported. It affected all the business interests of the country. They were in a state of uncertainty and alarm. Mr. Quay, of Pennsylvania, proposed a resolution to the effect that certain enumerated measures, not including the election bill, should be considered at that session, and that all others should be postponed. That, I suppose, would have had the entire Democratic support and Republicans enough to give it a majority. It would have postponed the election bill without giving any assurance of its consideration at the short session. So a conference of Republicans was held at which an agreement was made, which I drew up, and signed by a majority of the entire Senate. It entitled the friends of the election bill to be assured that it would be brought to a vote and passed at the short session, if there were then a majority in its favor. This is the agreement, of which I have the original, with the original signatures annexed, in my possession:

"We will vote: 1. To take up for consideration on the first day of the next session the Federal election bill, and to keep it before the Senate to the exclusion of other legislative business, until it shall be disposed of by a vote. 2. To make such provision as to the time and manner of taking the vote as shall be decided, by a majority of the Republican Senators, to be necessary in order to secure such vote, either by a general rule like that proposed by Mr. Hoar, and now pending before the Committee on Rules, or by special rule of the same purport, applicable only to the election bill."

At the next December session the bill was taken up for consideration and, after a few days' debate, there was a motion to lay it aside. Since the measure had been first introduced, the sentiment in certain parts of the country in favor of the free coinage of silver had been strengthened. Several of the Republican Senators were among its most zealous advocates. There was a motion to lay aside the election bill, which was adopted by a bare majority, the Democrats voting for it and several of the silver Republican Senators, so-called. All but one of these had signed their names to the promise I have printed. I never have known by what process of reasoning they reconciled their action with their word. But I know that in heated political strife men of honor, even men of ability, sometimes deceive themselves by a casuistic reasoning which would not convince them at other times.

The election bill deeply excited the whole country. Its supporters were denounced by the Democratic papers everywhere, North and South, with a bitterness which I hardly knew before that the English language was capable of expressing. My mail was crowded with letters, many of them anonymous, the rest generally quite as anonymous, even if the writer's name were signed, denouncing me with all the vigor and all the scurrility of which the writers were capable. I think this is the last great outbreak of anger which has spread throughout the American people.

I got, however, a good deal of consolation from the stanch friendship and support of the Republicans of Massachusetts, which never failed me during the very height of this storm. Whittier sent me a volume of poetry which he had just published, with the inscription written on the blank leaf in his own hand, "To George F. Hoar, with the love of his old friend, John G. Whittier." I think I would have gone through ten times as much objurgation as I had to encounter for those few words.

There has never since been an attempt to protect national elections by national authority. The last vestige of the national statute for securing purity of elections was repealed in President Cleveland's second administration, under the lead of Senator Hill, of New York. I have reflected very carefully as to my duty in that matter. I am clearly of the opinion that Congress has power to regulate the matter of elections of Members of the House of Representatives and to make suitable provisions for honest elections and an honest ascertainment of the result, and that such legislation ought to be enacted and kept on the statute book and enforced. But such legislation, to be of any value whatever, must be permanent. If it only be maintained in force while one political party is in power and repealed when its antagonist comes in, and is to be a constant matter of political strife and sectional discussion, it is better, in my judgment, to abandon it than to keep up an incessant, fruitless struggle. It is like legislation to prohibit by law the selling of liquor. I believe that it would be wise to prohibit the sale of liquor, with the exceptions usually made in prohibitory laws. But if we are to have in any State, as we have had in so many States, a prohibitory law one year, another with different provisions the next, a license law the next, and the difficulty all the time in enforcing any of them, it is better to give the attempt at prohibition up and to adopt a local option, or high license, or some other policy. In other words, it is better to have the second best law kept permanently on the statute book than to have the best law there half the time.

So after Senator Hill's repealing act got through the Senate, I announced that so far as I was concerned and so far as I had the right to express the opinion of Northern Republicans, I thought the attempt to secure the rights of the colored people by national legislation would be abandoned until there were a considerable change of opinion in the country, and especially in the South, and until it had ceased to become matter of party strife. To that announcement Senator Chandler, of New Hampshire, who had been one of the most zealous advocates of the national laws, expressed his assent. That statement has been repeated once or twice on the floor of the Senate. So far as I know, no Republican has dissented from it. Certainly there has been no bill for that purpose introduced in either House of Congress, or proposed, so far as I know, in the Republican press or in any Republican platform since.

The question upon which the policy of all national election laws depends is, At whose will do you hold your right to be an American citizen? What power can you invoke if that right be withheld from you? If you hold the right at will of your State, then you can invoke no power but the State for its vindication. If you hold it at the will of the Nation, as expressed by the people of the whole Nation under the Constitution of the United States, then you are entitled to invoke the power of the United States for its enforcement whenever necessary. If you hold it at the will of the white Democracy of any State or neighborhood then, as unfortunately seems to be the case in a good many States, you will be permitted to exercise it only if you are a white man, and then only so long as you are a Democrat.

I have had during my whole life to deal with that most difficult of all political problems, the relation to each other, in a Republic, of men of different races. It is a question which has vexed the American people from the beginning of their history. It is, if I am not much mistaken, to vex them still more hereafter. First the Indian, then the Negro, then the Chinese, now the Filipino, disturb our peace. In the near future will come the Italian and the Pole and the great population of Asia, with whom we are soon to be brought into most intimate and close relation.

In my opinion, in all these race difficulties and troubles, the fault has been with the Anglo-Saxon. Undoubtedly the Indian has been a savage; the Negro has been a savage; the lower order of Chinamen have been gross and sometimes bestial. The inhabitants of the Philippine Islands in their natural rights, which, as we had solemnly declared to be a self-evident truth, were theirs beyond question, have committed acts of barbarism. But in every case these inferior and alien races, if thef had been dealt with justly, in my opinion would have been elevated by quiet, peaceful, and Christian conduct on our part to a higher plane and brought out of their barbarism. The white man has been the offender.

I have no desire to recall the story of the methods by which the political majorities, consisting in many communities largely of negroes and led by immigrants from the North, were subdued.

This is not a sectional question.

It is not a race question. The suffrage was conferred on the negro by the Southern States themselves. They can always make their own rules. If the negro be ignorant, you may define ignorance and disfranchise that. If the negro be vicious, you may define vice and disfranchise that. If the negro be poor, you may define poverty and disfranchise that. If the negro be idle, you may define idleness and disfranchise that. If the negro be lazy, you may define laziness and disfranchise that. If you will only disfranchise him for the qualities which you say unfit him to vote and not for his race or the color of his skin, there is no constitutional obstacle in your way.

So it was not wholly a race or a color problem. It was largely a question of party supremacy. In three States—Alabama, South Carolina, and Florida—white Democrats charged each other with stifling the voice of the majority by fraudulent election processes, and in Alabama they claimed that a majority of white men were disfranchised by a false count of negro votes in the black belt.

It was not wholly unnatural that the men who, in dealing with each other, were men of scrupulous honor and of undoubted courage should have brought themselves to do such things, or at any rate to screen and sympathize with the more hot-headed men who did them. The proof in the public records of those public crimes is abundant. With the exception of Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, there is no record of a single manly remonstrance or expression of disapproval from the lips of any prominent southern man. But they had persuaded themselves to believe that a contest for political power with a party largely composed of negroes was a contest for their civilization itself. They thought it like a fight for life with a pack of wolves. In some parts of the South there were men as ready to murder a negro who tried to get an office as to kill a fox they found prowling about a henroost. These brave and haughty men who had governed the country for half a century, who had held the power of the United States at bay for four years, who had never doffed their hats to any prince or noble on earth, even in whose faults or vices there was nothing mean or petty, never having been suspected of corruption, who, as Macaulay said of the younger Pitt, "If in an hour of ambition they might have been tempted to ruin their country, never would have stooped to pilfer from her," could not brook the sight of a legislature made up of ignorant negroes who had been their own slaves, and of venal carpetbaggers. They could not endure that men, some of whom had been bought and sold like chattels in the time of slavery, and others ready to sell themselves, although they were freemen, should sit to legislate for their States with their noble and brave history. I myself, although I have always maintained, and do now, the equal right of all men of whatever color or race to a share in the government of the country, felt a thrill of sadness when I saw the Legislature of Louisiana in session in the winter of 1873.

There was a good deal of to provoke them also in the character of some of the northern men who had gone to the South to take an active part in political affairs. Some of them were men of the highest character and honor, actuated by pure and unselfish motives. If they had been met cordially by the communities where they took up their abode they would have brought to them a most valuable quality of citizenship. If northern immigration and northern capital had been welcomed at the South, it would have had as helpful an influence as it had in California and Oregon. But the southern men treated them all alike. I incline to think that a large number of the men who got political office in the South, when the men who had taken part in the Rebellion were still disfranchised and the Republicans were still in power, were of a character that would not have been tolerated in public office in the North. Gen. Willard Warner, of Alabama, a brave Union soldier, a Republican Senator from that State, was one of the best and bravest men who ever sat in that body. Gov. Packard, of Louisiana, was, I believe, a wise and honest man. But in general it was impossible not to feel a certain sympathy with a people who, whatever else had been their faults, never were guilty of corruption or meanness or the desire to make money out of public office, in the intolerable loathing which they felt for these strangers who had taken possession of the high places in their States.

President Grant gave the influence and authority of his administration toward maintaining in power the lawfully chosen Republican State governments. But in spite of all he could do they had all been overthrown but two when the presidential election was held in 1876. Those two were South Carolina and Louisiana. The people of those two States had chosen Republican governors at the State election held on the same day with the election of the President. But these governors could not hold their power 24 hours without the support of the national administration. When that was withdrawn the negro and carpetbag majority was powerless as a flock of sheep before a pack of wolves to resist their brave and unscrupulous Democratic enemy, however inferior the latter in numbers.

In attempting to give a dispassionate account of the history of this great question which has entered so deeply into the political and social life of the American people almost from the beginning, it is hard to measure the influence of race prejudice, of sectional feeling, and of that other powerful motive, eagerness for party supremacy.

Suffrage was conferred upon the negro by the Southern States themselves. Under the Constitution every State can prescribe its own qualifications for suffrage, with the single exception that no State can deny or abridge the right of a citizen of the United States to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

But I am bound to say—indeed, it is but to repeat what I have said many times—that my long conflict with their leaders has impressed me with an ever-increasing admiration of the great and high qualities of our southern people. I said at Chicago in February, 1903, what I said, in substance, 20 years before in Faneuil Hall, and at about the same time in the Senate:

"Having said what I thought to say on this question, perhaps I may be indulged in adding that although my life, politically and personally, has been a life of almost constant strife with the leaders of the southern people, yet as I grow older I have learned not only to respect and esteem, but to love, the great qualities which belong to my fellow citizens of the Southern States. They are a noble race. We may well take pattern from them in some of the great virtues which make up the strength, as they make the glory, of free States. Their love of home, their chivalrous respect for woman, their courage, their delicate sense of honor, their constancy, which can abide by an opinion or a purpose or an interest of their States through adversity and through prosperity, through the years and through the generations, are things by which the people of the more mercurial North may take a lesson. And there is another thing—covetousness, corruption, the low temptation of money has not yet found any place in our southern politics.

"Now, my friends, we can not afford to live, we don't wish to live, and we will not live, in a state of estrangement from a people who possess these qualities. They are our kindred, bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh, blood of our blood, and whatever may be the temporary error of any Southern State I, for one, if I have a right to speak for Massachusetts, say to her, 'Entreat me not to leave thee, nor to return from following after thee. For where thou goest I will go, and where thou stayest I will stay also. And thy people shall be my people and thy God my God.'"

In July, 1898, I was invited to deliver an address before the Virginia Bar Association. I was received by that company of distinguished gentlemen with a hospitality like that I had found at Charleston the year before. Certainly the old estrangements are gone. I took occasion in my address to appeal to the Virginia bar to give the weight of their great influence in sustaining the dignity and authority of the Supreme Court, in spite of their disappointment at some of its decisions of constitutional questions. They received what I had to say, although they knew I differed from them on some of the gravest matters which concerned the State and had been an antislavery man from my youth, with a respect and courtesy which left nothing to be desired. At the banquet which followed the address this toast was given by William Wirt Henry, a grandson of Patrick Henry, himself one of the foremost lawyers and historians of the South. I prize very highly the original which I have in his handwriting.

"Massachusetts and Virginia.

"Foremost in planting the English colonies in America;

"Foremost in resisting British tyranny;

"Foremost in the Revolution which won our independence and established our free institutions;

"May the memories of the past be the bond of the future."

My own endeavor during my long public life has been to maintain the doctrine of the Declaration of Independence, which declares the right of every man to political equality by virtue of his manhood, and of every people to self-government by virtue of its character as a people. This our fathers meant to lay down as the fundamental law of States and of the United States, having its steadfast and immovable foundation in the law of God. It was never their purpose to declare that ignorance or vice or want of experience of the institutions of a country should not disqualify men from a share in the Government. Those things they meant to leave to the discretion of the power, whether State or National, which was to prescribe the qualifications of suffrage. But they did not mean that the accident of birthplace or the accident of race or the accident of color should enter into the question at all. To this doctrine I have, in my humble way, endeavored to adhere. In dealing with the Chinese or any class of immigrants I would prescribe as strict a rule as the strictest for ascertaining whether the immigrant meant in good faith to be an American citizen, whether he meant to end his life here, to bring his wife and children with him, whether he loved American institutions, whether he was fit to understand the political problems with which the people had to deal, whether he had individual worth or health of body or mind. I would make, if need be, 10 years or 2 years as the necessary period of residence for naturalization.

I would deal with the negro or the German or the Frenchman or the Italian on the same principle. But the one thing I have never consented to is that a man shall be kept out of this country or kept in a position of inferiority while he is in it because of his color, because of his birthplace, or because of his race.

One matter in connection with the management of the elections bill I have never been able to think of since without a shudder. The Democrats in the Senate, led by Mr. Gorman, the most skillful of their leaders, endeavored to defeat the bill by the tactics of delay. If the debate could be prolonged so that it was impossible to get a vote without the loss of the great appropriation bills, or some of them, the bill of course must be laid aside. So the Republicans, on the other hand, as is usual in such cases, refrained from debate, leaving their antagonists to take up the time. Every afternoon at about 5 o'clock some Democrat would come to me saying that he was to take the floor, but that he did not feel well or was not quite ready with some material, and ask me as a personal favor to let the matter go over until the next morning. This happened so often that I became satisfied it was a concerted scheme, and made up my mind that I would not yield to such a request again.

But one afternoon Senator Wilson of Maryland, a quiet and most estimable gentleman, whom I had known very well, and for whom I had a high regard, came to me and said he felt quite unwell; he could go on that afternoon, if I insisted upon it; but he would like much better to put off speaking till the next day. I was just beginning my answer to the effect that I had heard that so often that I had determined I would not yield again to the request. But I said to myself, It can not be possible that this man would undertake to deceive me. He is a gentleman of high character, absolutely honorable and incapable of falsehood. So I answered, "Of course, Mr. Wilson, if you are ill, I will consent to your desire." Mr. Wilson made his speech the next day. This was December 15. A few weeks after, on the 24th of February, Mr. Wilson died suddenly of heart disease. It was an affection of which he had been conscious for some years, and which he had for some time expected would cause sudden death. I dare say if he had been compelled to proceed with his speech that day it would have been fatal. In that case my life would have been embittered by the memory.

We had a meeting of the Republican members of the committee, for consultation, before we reported the bill. Mr. Evarts, while he approved the principle of the measure, shared very strongly my own hesitation, caused by the fear of the political effect of the defeat of a measure likely to excite so much angry strife throughout the country. After hearing the opinion of those who favored going on with the bill, Mr. Evarts said: "I spent a Sunday with Judge Kent on the Hudson a good many years ago, with several New York lawyers. We all went to the Episcopal Church in the forenoon, and dined with the judge after church. During the service one of the company kept far behind in the responses, which annoyed the judge a good deal. At dinner he broke out, 'Davis, why can't you descend into hell with the rest of the congregation?' I will descend into hell with the rest of the congregation."

Mr. Evarts made the descent and stood loyally by the measure in the debate to the best of his great ability.

I do not know of anything quite so instructive as the manner in which the attempt to regulate elections was disposed of at that time. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, some 10 or 12 years ago I offered an amendment to a pending bill in this House to elect United States Senators by the people, and the bill was amended and passed by this House practically with the unanimous vote of this side of the House and most of the votes on that side of the House providing for the election of United States Senators by the people without any more limitations than are contained in the bill now offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have no fear of a force bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I have no fear that the people of the North desire any more to control the election machinery of the Southern States to-day than the people of the South desire to control the election machinery of the North. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the maintenance of the fundamental principles of the Constitution of the United States in their integrity, as established by our fathers. I believe that those great fundamental principles that are written in the Constitution of the United States are there to protect the rights and the liberties and the property of the minority, and to see that they are not destroyed by the ruthless hands of a brutal majority any more than they should be destroyed by a czar or a kingly power. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Government of the United States should be controlled by the people of the United States [applause], and be responsive to the sober, deliberate judgment of a majority of the people of the United States, as determined and exercised by their chosen representatives in the Congress of the United States. I believe that in the past it has been demonstrated that our present method of electing United States Senators does not make them responsive to the deliberate and sober judgment of the American people at all times. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I do not believe that the election of United States Senators by the people will overthrow the guaranties of the Constitution of the United States. On the other hand, I believe it will bring our Government in closer touch with the American people than it is to-day. [Applause.]

It will make it more responsive to the real will of the American people, and in this day and hour, when new theories are being advanced, when it is being proclaimed that we should tear down the fundamental principles, that we should go back to the old idea of a direct Democracy and legislate absolutely by the voter himself instead of his representative, I do not believe you can pass any bill, Mr. Speaker, that will do so much to strengthen and sustain the Constitution of the United States as it was established by our fathers as this bill, authorizing the people of the United States to elect by their own votes their representatives in the Senate of the United States as well as in this House. [Applause.]

Now, if I could select, I would enact the bill that we voted for in the House originally. I prefer that form of the bill, but I realize, as every other man within the sound of my voice realizes, that if you do not pass this bill as it is proposed by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], you defeat the proposition, and it will not be submitted to the people of the United States for them to pass upon.

We are not enacting this into law. If it is a vicious proposition, one more than a fourth of the States can defeat it. It goes to the people and the States for their determination. I would vote for the proposition offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] if I had not reached the conclusion that the adoption of his amendment would endanger the vital proposition that is pending before the House. If I were assured that the proposition offered by the gentleman from Georgia could be adopted as an amendment and passed by the Senate of the United States; if I were assured that we could adopt his amendment and that it would go to the Senate and the bill would yet come back here and we would get a chance to vote on it I would vote for the proposition offered by the gentleman from Georgia. But, believing as I do, that if we adopt that amendment and send the bill back to the Senate of the United States we would thereby ring its death knell, and that the only chance, after awaiting for decades, of giving the people of the United States an opportunity to vote on a constitutional amendment that will give them the free right to select their representatives, to voice their will in both branches of Congress, is to pass this resolution as proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER]. I, with my vote, will sustain him when the roll is called. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] is recognized.

Mr. BARTLETT. How much time is there remaining, Mr. Speaker, upon this side?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] has 31 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] 24 minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman from Missouri want me to proceed now?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. If the gentleman will.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, the original resolution proposing to amend the Constitution so as to provide for the popular election of Senators, was a House resolution. After full debate it was passed in this body by an overwhelming majority. Prior to its passage the House voted down two amendments designed to leave in the hands of Congress the paramount authority to make regulations relating to the time, place, and manner of holding elections for United States Senators. In the form in which the joint resolution passed this body, it was expressly provided that this power of regulation should be exclusively lodged in the legislatures of the respective States. The vice of the Bristow, or Senate amendment to this resolution consists in the fact that it strikes out this provision for exclusive State regulation, and leaves the power in the hands of the States, subject to Federal control. We are now asked to recede from a position which we maintained by three separate votes of record, and agree to a proposition which we solemnly rejected by those votes.

I would like to know what sufficient argument has been advanced to-day to justify this House in receding from an attitude which it so deliberately adopted, or why it is so strenuously insisted that we should accede to an objectionable amendment that was adopted in the coordinate branch by a majority of one?

Why does my friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] insist with such confidence that if we adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, we sound the death knell of the movement for the popular election of United States Senators? The attitude of the Senate has for many years, been one of hostility to this method of selecting the Members of that body.

Should the Senate with its well-known record of hostility, or indifference to this amendment, designed to bring the Members of the so-called upper branch, into more direct and responsive relations to the people, decide to reject the whole proposition from hostility to the Bartlett amendment, there will be no difficulty on the part of the American people in placing the blame for this rejection where that blame belongs. Should we lose the amendment at this session we will not lose it for all time. It will be at most a mere temporary defeat that the real friends of this movement can well afford to hazard, to gain the greater victory. [Applause.] There is another House of Representatives to be elected this fall. There are other Senators to be elected, in the near future, and I have no apprehension, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The gentleman means that we could introduce a new resolution and put it through the Senate again at the next session?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The gentleman means that we could probably get votes enough to pass it?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Does not the gentleman know that it would be impossible to get a two-thirds vote of that Senate now on any proposition like this?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I only know this, that on a great, fundamental proposition like this, on the one side of which is the popular branch of Congress, and the great American people, and on the other, the Senate of the United States, that body can not continuously maintain an attitude of opposition to the popular will. I know this as well as I know anything. I know that the history of all reforms is that the House of Representatives continues to put a proposition up to the Senate, until finally the pressure of public opinion compels that body to adopt it. This is the history of progressive legislation in this country. It is, I may say, the history of progressive legislation in all free countries.

A sectional element has been injected into the consideration of this question, which has no proper place here. We of the South are no more acutely interested in this amendment than the Members from the East, or the North, or the West.

The possible danger of force bills, brings no greater apprehension to us, than it should bring to the Members from other sections who believe in the rights of the States.

This proposition should be considered on its merits, unrelated to the unhappy legislation of the era of reconstruction, save only as that legislation illustrates the powers claimed by Congress under the paramount authority to make regulations for the manner of holding elections for Representatives. I would like to ask my friends on the other side, and for that matter some of my friends on this side, why it is that they reiterate the assertion that they have no apprehension that the time will ever come again when deputy marshals, or Federal supervisors, or Federal soldiers will attend the elections for Members of this body. They say that these things have passed away, never to return; and yet they insist upon retaining in the Federal Constitution that provision upon which, and upon which alone, rests the authority to order this interference with the orderly conduct of elections in the States.

I favor the amendment as it originally passed this House, because it remits to the States the authority to prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators. There is no man on, or off this floor who can define the limits of the Federal authority to interfere with the regulations of the States touching the manner of holding elections for Members of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. SAUNDERS. When the Constitution declares that the Congress shall have paramount authority to provide regulations with respect to the time, the place, and the manner, of holding elections, we are at no loss to know the meaning of that instrument so far as it relates to the time, and the place. But there is no participant in this debate who can inform this House what is comprehended in the power to make regulations as to "the manner of holding elections," or who will undertake to establish its delimitations. I affirm that it is a dangerous thing for a free people to preserve in their organic law, a provision of indefinite authority, one never likely to be used, save in time of political stress, and then used only to be abused. Why this insistence upon the retention of a provision affording a power which it is stoutly insisted will never be exercised?

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. JACKSON. Does the gentleman mean to argue that he would advocate the repeal of that provision concerning the election of Members of this House?

Mr. SAUNDERS. With respect to the time, place, and manner?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I certainly would, for this reason, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. JACKSON. Then, the gentleman believes that this House and the Senate should have no power whatever over the manner in which their Members should be elected?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Does the gentleman from Kansas know what are the limits of the power conferred by that language?

Mr. JACKSON. I think the courts have settled that pretty well.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Never so far as I am aware. The extent of that authority has never been fixed, or its limits ascertained to any definite or certain degree. A large power of some sort is conferred, a power that is dangerous in proportion to its uncertainty.

Mr. JACKSON. The gentleman can say the same thing about a great many other definitions, but the courts have had no trouble in applying this.

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, but they have.

Mr. JACKSON. They have had no trouble in applying this in a way entirely just to everyone concerned.

Mr. SAUNDERS. This is a matter of fundamental power, of fundamental relation between the States and the Nation, and the language by which this power is conveyed, and this relation is established, is vague, and indefinite. The unknown is always terrifying, and the indefinite should always be made definite, or else eliminated. The State of the gentleman from Kansas is as much interested in opposing the Bristow amendment as is my own State.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I can not yield in two minutes. I have no objection if you will give me the time.

Mr. JACKSON. I have no time to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. SAUNDERS. This House has some Members who have been here long enough to have participated in the debate on the force bill. There are many others who followed the course of the same debate, and we all know that when that bill was before this body, and the subject of discussion, the advocates of the measure, relied exclusively upon the provision relating to the manner of holding elections, to justify its objectionable provisions. You gentlemen say that the days of the force bill will never return. Why then do you desire to retain a provision upon which the authority to enact such a bill rests, and rests exclusively?

Mr. Speaker, it is fundamentally true that no constitution should include any provision that undertakes to establish relations, and afford authority that are insusceptible of exact ascertainment. If the gentlemen on that side are sincere, and the gentlemen on this side are equally sincere, in believing that never again will the effort be made to enact a force bill, then take advantage of this era of good feeling to strike from the Constitution the clause which continues the possibility of such a measure as the outcome of some future Congress not so happily constituted.

Now is the time to stand by our former action. Never fear that our consistent adherence to the attitude embodied in the passage of the House resolution, will cause us to lose this great, this progressive, this fundamental measure of reform in the method of selecting Senators of the United States.

The suggestion that the other body will kill the whole proposition unless we agree to the Bristow amendment, should not influence our action. This movement will not die in that fashion. A temporary reverse is often the prelude of a more complete and glorious victory. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I now yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, during my term of service in this House the House has passed three or four or five times a resolution for an amendment to the Constitution to provide for the direct election of Senators. Every time that that resolution has been passed, previous to this Congress, it has been passed in substantially the form of the present Senate amendment. On each of these occasions when the resolution was passed in a Republican House I did not hear the gentleman from Georgia

[Mr. BARTLETT] or any other gentleman from the South express opposition to the resolution or express fear of its effect.

These resolutions were each passed practically by unanimous consent in the House, practically by unanimous vote in the House, and each time the resolution passed it involved precisely the same question that is now presented before the House by the Senate resolution.

I fail to understand why gentlemen, when these resolutions were in the House before, did not express opposition to the resolutions if they were opposed to them on the merits of the proposition. Each of these former resolutions died without action of the Senate.

We have now passed a resolution in the House which has been passed with an amendment in the Senate, and for the first time, except when it was sent to conference, for the first time in the history of the Republic we have an opportunity to-day to eventuate into a passed resolution and present a question to the States that we have been urging in this House for years [applause], and when the supreme moment comes, when the final opportunity offers itself, gentlemen who sat silent in their seats before, now find imaginary, ghost-like objections to the proposition. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] who has just spoken seems to assume that the original House resolution amended the provision of the Constitution to which he referred, but it does not do so at all. The provision of the Constitution giving Congress the power to fix the time, place, and manner of electing Members of the House is not proposed to be changed by the House resolution. The authority under which the force bill was legislated would still remain in the Constitution. The objections are imaginary; they are not well founded. We ought to preserve to the General Government at all times the supreme right in the last resort to preserve its existence by controlling the manner of elections, if it becomes necessary. No one believes that in our day it will become necessary to control the manner of elections in the States, but who can predict what may happen in the far future in some particular State? I am in favor of preserving the authority to the General Government, and in favor to-day, now, while we have the chance, of passing a resolution which will submit to the States a popular and needed reform—the election of Senators by the people. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri has 25 minutes remaining.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman from Missouri propose to close with one speech?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, of course this question can not be argued in 4 minutes, but it may be illustrated. At present, under our Constitution, the Senate of the United States is chosen by the legislatures of the different States, and under that express provision of the Constitution there has never been found any means by which the Federal Government can project itself into the election of Senators by the presence of either troops or the judging of the qualifications of electors, or the appointment of supervisors of elections or judges of elections, or the use of United States marshals. With the Bartlett amendment we may obtain the election of Senators by direct vote of the people and yet preserve to the States the same, sole State control of such elections as we have now. But without that amendment a new element is injected into the election of Senators, to wit, the Federal power to provide the qualification of electors of Senators, the Federal appointment of supervisors of the election of Senators and judges of elections, the use of United States marshals, and the use of the United States troops at the election of Senators whenever the party in power nationally may be tempted to exercise such power. Whether this may happen next year or 20 years from now I know not.

Now, the illustration I wish to make is this. It is an old story, but it puts the question before us clearly: A simple-minded youth on one occasion was dividing the flocks of his father with a wiser brother. There was one magnificent sheep in the bunch that Simple Billy loved to distraction. The wiser brother divided the sheep into two flocks and placed this magnificent sheep in among a lot of poor, scabby sheep, and then he said to Billy, "Take your choice." Simple Billy studied long, but at last he turned himself sadly from his much-loved favorite. With sorrow and longing he looked at his sheep and said, "I love you, but I can't love your company."

Now, the election of Senators by direct vote of the people is my desire, but you include in the plan of that election the scabby sheep of the power of the Federal Government to provide qualifications for electors; you put in the scabby sheep that authorizes the establishment of supervisors of elections; you put in the scabby sheep that will authorize the Federal Government to appoint judges of elections; you put in the scabby sheep that will authorize the Federal Government to appoint United States marshals to supervise elections and place the military authorities and troops of the Federal Government in charge of the election of Senators. For one I may love the magnificent sheep as did Simple Billy, but I do not like the company he is in. [Applause.]

For one, Mr. Speaker, I will not cast my vote to tear down the temple in which is the last refuge of State sovereignty. [Applause.] I will maintain as far as I know the inviolable autonomy of indestructible States; I will spell Nation with a big "N," but also spell State with a big "S." [Applause.]

No man can say what the future may bring forth, and because all is peaceful now is no reason we may not have evils to encounter in the future; not in the South alone, but in the West and in the North. [Applause.] In this measure, without the Bartlett amendment, we attack the very corner stone upon which the indestructibility of the States rests and pave the way for their destruction.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONRY].

Mr. CONRY. Mr. Speaker, when this proposition came up before the House for consideration originally, I voted for it, because I believed then, as I believe now, that the creation of power upon the theory that it is not going to be exercised or employed is a principle that is wrong and pernicious in government. It is an untenable principle, and the elimination of such a provision from the Constitution is an imperative necessity. There were two great reforms contemplated by that legislation. First, the election of Senators by direct vote of the people [applause], and, secondly, the elimination from the Constitution of that provision which created a power and authority in the Government upon the theory that it would never be employed. Not being able to secure the accomplishment of both of these reforms, as a member of the conference committee representing this House I yielded the lesser evil to the accomplishment of the greater reform, because I believed that the demands for the reform contemplated by this resolution appealed more forcibly and more potentially to the minds and the hearts and the patriotism of the American people than would the other one. [Applause.]

For that reason I come here to this House to-day prepared to vote for the proposition that is submitted to us by the committee, knowing full well that if that proposition is accepted by this House this great reform will assuredly be consummated. We will effect a reform, universally demanded, which has agitated the country for the last 25 or 30 years. And when legislators, honestly seeking true reform, are confronted by the condition which will guarantee the successful accomplishment of their purpose, it is their patriotic duty to yield a moiety of their demands in order that the paramount issue may be crystallized into law, and for that reason I will support, and I honestly believe every Member of this side of the House will be fully justified in supporting, the proposition which now calls for our wise and careful consideration. [Applause.]

The fears entertained by some Members on this side of the House are not justified by the conduct of the Government in dealing with the constitutional regulations affecting the election of Senators. Never during the existence of the Republic have the powers intrusted to the Government by the Constitution been exercised to the detriment either of the people or of the States. The time for the accomplishment of this great reform is at hand. The opportunity to carry it into effect is here. Should we fail to take advantage of it, we will be held to a strict accountability for our stewardship before the country. There is but one course to follow, and that is the unqualified support of this resolution. In its support we will fulfill our pledges to the people and perform our patriotic duty to the States and to the Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, it is admitted, under the provisions of the Constitution as it stands now, that the Congress of the United States, if it saw proper to exercise the power conferred, can superintend and supervise the elections of Members of this House. It is admitted that under the provisions of the Constitution as it exists to-day the Congress of the United States has not the power to the same extent to supervise and superintend the election of United States Senators. The purpose when the Constitution was adopted was to preserve this distinction, giving to the Government of the United States the right to supervise the election of the Members of the House, but denying to the Government of the United States the right to supervise the election of United States Senators and reserving that right to the States. Then it is proposed by this provision, as it is written in this resolution, to give to the Congress of the United States the same right to superintend and supervise the election of Senators as it has to supervise the election of Members of the House. I favor the election of United States Senators by the people. I have so voted and advocated it during my political life, and I would gladly vote for the provision to-day as it passed the House and went to the Senate, but I regret I shall not have an opportunity to do so. The fact that Members insist on keeping the provisions of this resolution as it exists to-day shows that they intend to take away from the States some of the power which they now have and correspondingly confer it upon the Government of the United States. I can not conscientiously vote for that proposition, and I will not do so. I will never vote to take any power now conferred upon the States away and give it to the Federal Government.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, how much time is there remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eight minutes left.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the Democratic platform of 1908 contains a provision which is as follows:

Believing, with Jefferson, in "the support of the State governments in all their rights as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns and the surest bulwarks against antirepublican tendencies," and in "the preservation of the General Government in whole constitutional vigor as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad," we are opposed to the centralization implied in the suggestion, now frequently made, that the powers of the General Government should be extended by judicial construction.

Mr. Speaker, the Democratic caucus that met in this Hall immediately on the assembling of this Congress declared in favor of certain measures, and declared in favor of the Rucker bill, which passed this House, and this House, on the 13th of April, voted for the Rucker bill and voted down the Young amendment, which is identical in word, in language, and in every way with the proposed amendment. The bill then went to the Senate, and the Senate added or substituted for our bill the Bristow amendment, and on the 21st day of June, 1911, each Member on this side of the House, by a majority of 60, voted against this identical proposition, and now, with the hands of this House tied by caucus, with the direction by a unanimous vote of the caucus to stand and vote for the original Rucker bill, we come in here to-day and we find the gentleman from Missouri and the Democratic floor leader on this side of the House advocating that which the Democratic caucus refused to advocate and advocating that which he voted against in a Democratic caucus, and again on the 13th day of April and on the 21st day of June, 1911. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that it is the duty of this House, because the Senate has seen fit to vote upon an amendment which has twice been voted down, which finds no place in the Democratic caucus, to now support it because the Senate upon one vote declines to recede. Shall we surrender tamely, supinely, and cowardly the position of the House to the Senate? Ah, Mr. Speaker, I regret to see the gentleman from Alabama take the position that he did. I will not state that it is a disappointment to me, because that is immaterial, but I had reason to hope, I had his assurance that this amendment that I offered would be voted for and supported by him. I have no criticism to make upon his change of opinion, because he had the right to make that change, but it is fortunate for the gentleman from Alabama that he did not make that speech 10 days ago.

Mr. Speaker, it was never the intention of the framers of the Constitution that Congress should control or regulate the election of Representatives in Congress except when the States failed or neglected to make the necessary regulations as to the holding such elections. As showing this intent, I quote the following:

The convention of the State of South Carolina used this language when it passed upon the question of the adoption of the Constitution. In its articles of adoption the State said:

"And whereas it is essential to the preservation of the rights reserved to the several States and the freedom of the people, under the operation of a General Government, that the right of prescribing the manner, time, and places of holding the elections to the Federal Legislature should be forever inseparably annexed to the sovereignty of the several States: This convention doth declare that the same ought to remain to all posterity a perpetual and fundamental right in the local, exclusive of the interference of the General Government, except in cases where the legislatures of the States shall refuse or neglect to perform and fulfill the same according to the tenor of said Constitution."

The State of Virginia, in its act of June 26, 1788, adopting the Constitution, used this language:

"That Congress shall not alter, modify, or interfere in the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, or either of them, except when the legislature of any State shall neglect, refuse, or be disabled, by invasion or rebellion, to prescribe the same."

North Carolina adopted the Constitution in 1789, and in so doing used the same language that Virginia did, each of them expressing the same idea, that this dangerous grant of power in the Federal Government was only to provide against the contingency that the States themselves should refuse or fail to exercise it, and that Congress should not interfere in prescribing the times, places, and manner of holding elections except when the legislature of any State should neglect or refuse or be incapable to prescribe the same.

The State of New York, from which, as I said, I have copied this amendment, although it is almost in the same language in the resolutions adopted by the other States, ratified the Constitution on the 28th of July, 1788, and used this language in the act of ratification:

"Under these impressions"—

Which had been previously stated in the resolution—

"Under these impressions, and declaring that the rights aforesaid can not be abridged or violated, and that the explanations aforesaid are consistent with the said Constitution, and in confidence that the amendments which shall have been proposed to the said Constitution shall receive an early and mature consideration, we, the said delegates * * * do by these presents assent to and ratify the said Constitution.

"In full confidence, nevertheless, that until a convention shall be called and convened for proposing amendments to the Constitution * * * that the Congress will not make or alter any regulation in this State respecting the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives unless the legislature in this State shall neglect or refuse to make laws or regulations for the purpose, or from any circumstances be incapable of making the same, and that in those cases such power will duly be exercised until the legislature of this State shall make provisions in the premises."

Rhode Island, June 26, 1790, used the same language as did the State of New York—only stronger.

Pennsylvania said, in the article adopting the Constitution:

"That Congress shall not have power to make or alter regulations concerning the time, place, and manner of electing Senators and Representatives, except in case of neglect or refusal by the State to make regulations for the purpose, and then only for such time as such neglect or refusal shall continue."

The State of Massachusetts, February 6, 1789, used this language:

"That Congress do not exercise the powers vested in them by the fourth section of the first article but in cases when a State shall neglect or refuse to make the regulations therein mentioned, or shall make regulations subversive of the rights of the people to a free and equal representation in Congress, agreeably to the Constitution."

And Massachusetts, in the same document, went on to say:

"And the convention do, in the name and in behalf of the people of this Commonwealth, enjoin it upon their Representatives in Congress at all times, until the alterations and provisions aforesaid have been considered agreeably to the fifth article of said Constitution, to exert all their influence and use all reasonable and legal methods to obtain a ratification of said alterations and provisions, in such manner as is provided in said article."

New Hampshire ratified on June 21, 1788, and used in recommendation the same language as did Massachusetts.

Mr. Speaker, what is the amendment I offer? I propose by this amendment to declare and say that the Congress shall not have the power to order or change the qualifications of the electors of a State. What Democrat will rise in his place here to-day and say he is in favor of the United States Congress changing or altering or providing for the qualifications of voters in the various States, or that power should not remain where it has been lodged since the foundation of this Government? The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly upheld the right of the States to regulate the right of suffrage, and who among the Democratic majority will declare he is in favor of changing this law, as you will if you oppose my amendment?

Stand up. I pause that you may do so. When you do, you mark yourself as not being in favor of a Democratic doctrine. What man is there on this side that is in favor of the appointment of supervisors of elections, judges of elections, and returning boards? What Democrat on this side is in favor of that? If there are any, stand up and say that you are in favor if it. What Democrat on this side is in favor of permitting the use of United States marshals and military forces and the Army of the United States at the polls during elections? If there be any Democrat who is in favor of it, stand up and have the nerve to say it. All that the amendment I propose provides is that Congress shall not have authority hereafter to do these things. Do you Members from Indiana remember the prosecution of your citizens there under the Federal election law? Are you in favor of granting Congress that power under the Bristow amendment? If you are, vote against my amendment.

Mr Speaker, I close this debate as I began. The people of Georgia, whom I have the honor, in part, to represent on this floor and whom I have endeavored faithfully, if not efficiently, to represent for 17 years, are Democrats by faith, by environment, and by all the things that they hold holy and sacred. And, Mr. Speaker, our social system and local self-government will be preserved by the white people of the South for themselves and their posterity in spite of all that can be said or done by busybodies or intermeddlers.

The immutable laws of God can not be changed or be made to bend to serve the ideas or purposes of would-be philanthropists or pretended reformers.

The immutable decrees of Providence that make the Caucasian—the Anglo-Saxon—the superior race; that forbid its deterioration, by submission to an inferior race, have stood the test through the moral and physical convulsions of more than 20 centuries, and will stand the test of the centuries yet to come, till—

> The cloud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces,
> The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
> Yea, and all which it inherit, shall dissolve.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] yield me one minute of his time?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman. Mr. Speaker, we propose to stand by the Democratic Party, but, above all, we propose to stand by that determination we made during the trying years of the reconstruction period and have kept through all the years, to preserve inviolable the white supremacy and the Caucasian control of our section. And now in this hour, when our own party associates would again subject us to the like dangers—

> Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
> Lest we forget, lest we forget.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] has 21 minutes remaining.

[Mr. RUCKER of Missouri addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am advised that there are a good many Members in the House who would like to extend remarks in the RECORD, both for and against this amendment; therefore I ask unanimous consent that any Member may have five legislative days within which to extend remarks.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman mean those who have spoken upon the measure?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. No; any Member.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend or to print remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. On this subject?

The SPEAKER. On this subject. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I wish to ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk, without objection, will again report the motion of the gentleman from Georgia. The Chair wishes to state that the vote will first be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia that the House concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

To concur in the Senate amendment with the following amendment: "Provided, That Congress shall not have the power or authority to provide for the qualification of electors of United States Senators within the various States of the United States, nor to authorize the appointment of supervisors of election, judges of election, returning boards to certify the results of any such election, nor to authorize the use of United States marshals or the military forces of the United States, or troops of the United States at the polls during the said election."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] moves that the House recede from its disagreement. Now, the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, if put at this time, must be also that the House recedes from its disagreement and concurs in the amendment with an amendment, because the first thing the House has to do is to recede.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thought I put it in proper form. It is a difference of tweedledee and tweedledum.

Mr. MANN. We are in disagreement with the Senate amendment, and we must first recede before we can agree to it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the superior knowledge of the gentleman from Illinois in parliamentary law.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the gentleman add to his motion a motion to recede.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will if it will not lose its preferential status.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment and move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment with the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk, without objection, will add to the gentleman's motion that the House recede from its disagreement and concur in the Senate amendment with the following amendment. The Clerk will report the motion as it now stands.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and concur in the Senate amendment, with the following amendment, etc.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 89, nays 189, answered "present" 5, not voting 109, as follows:

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Mr. RICHARDSON with Mr. CALDER.

Mr. BORLAND with Mr. CURRY.

Mr. DIES with Mr. MOTT.

Mr. GOEKE with Mr. PLUMLEY.

For the vote:

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY with Mr. WILSON of Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "aye."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the House when his name was called?

Mr. CARTER. I was called from the House during the latter part of the previous roll call by two gentlemen from Oklahoma, Hampton Tucker and D. C. McCurtain, of McAlester, to discuss some pending legislation, and when I returned my name had just been passed. I was absent only a few moments and was here during the major portion of the time of both roll calls. I do not like the Bristow amendment, but I strongly favor the main proposition, the election of Senators by direct vote of the people, and I desire to vote "aye" if it is now possible to do so.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "aye."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening when his name was called?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I do not think I was, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify.

The announcement of the vote as above recorded was received with applause.

Mr. SISSON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SISSON. Article V of the Constitution requires that two-thirds of both Houses, when they deem it necessary, may propose amendments to the Federal Constitution. Now, two-thirds of both Houses have not voted for this proposition.

The SPEAKER. It has always been held that two-thirds of the House means two-thirds of a quorum.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, that can not be the proper construction in reference to this article, but because every other——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman suspend half a minute?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that nothing is in order except the announcement of the result of the vote.

Mr. SISSON. I want to be heard on this, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be heard on the point of order. The Chair wishes to state the ruling. It has been held uniformly, so far as the Chair knows, that two-thirds of the House means two-thirds of those voting, a quorum being present.

Mr. SISSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to worry the Chair with comparing this article of the Constitution with the other articles of the Constitution where there have been a number of decisions of the Chair with reference to what constitutes a quorum. I have read the decision—there has been but one, and that by Speaker Reed—construing this particular clause of the Constitution. If the Chair shall hold with Speaker Reed on this proposition, we are in the absurd situation that only the fraction of a vote more than one-third of the membership may pass a constitutional provision.

Article V of the Constitution is perfectly distinct. It says:

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution.

It is not necessary to go further except to say in all other cases with reference to legislation it states that a majority shall be required to constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, and the passage of an ordinary bill requires only a majority of that quorum. But the language of the Constitution is such that it makes it absurd to say that a fraction of more than one-third of the membership of this House constitutes two-thirds of the House.

If the Chair should hold that the definition "the House" means simply a bare majority of the House, and does not constitute the entire membership of the House, then the ruling of Speaker Reed would be correct, but the House of Representatives is made up now of 394 Members. If you have 394 Members that constitute this House, then the entire membership of the House, under Article V, if it means anything, is required.

Now, there are some other matters that might help us out on this matter. For example, the Supreme Court in passing upon one clause of the Constitution, in speaking of passing a bill over the veto of the President, says it shall be by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in case of a bill. Now, the Constitution provides that in case of a bill it only takes a majority to pass it. Therefore, the Supreme Court held in that case that two-thirds of a quorum was all that was necessary, and with that single exception there has never been any construction of Article V except that by Speaker Reed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman if it is not true that all the constructions he has been able to find go one way?

Mr. SISSON. There is only one on this clause.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman just cited one from the Supreme Court.

Mr. SISSON. That was with reference to the passage of a bill over the veto of the President.

The SPEAKER. If it will hold on the passing of a bill over the veto of the President, what reason is there that it would not hold good on this?

Mr. SISSON. Because the Constitution specifically provides it shall be passed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to rules and limitations we prescribed in case of a bill, and it only requires a majority of a majority to pass a bill. It only requires, in other words, one more.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is for the gentleman from Mississippi to discuss his point of order.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I did not know he made a point of order.

Mr. SISSON. I did. It takes two-thirds of the number necessary to pass a bill in order to pass a bill over the President's veto. Now, in that case the Supreme Court, in arguing the question, argues at length, and but for the language provided in case of a bill it is perfectly clear the court would have held this language—"two-thirds of both Houses"—meant the entire membership of the House.

If it means the entire membership of the House, then it takes 260-odd votes to pass this joint resolution. If the construction placed upon it by Speaker Reed is the proper construction, then we have an absurdity in the Constitution—that one more than one-third of the membership of this House can propose an amendment to the Federal Constitution, and, that being the case, this provision of the Constitution is meaningless when it requires two-thirds to pass it.

The SPEAKER. It has been held time out of mind that when the phrase or collocation of words, "the House of Representatives" is used, it means a quorum of the House—that is, 198 Members in this House. If it can do one thing with a bare quorum it can do anything.

Now, last Friday, for instance, they had precisely a quorum on a bill here. It is true that they had to wait an hour or so to get that 197 men. Now, if 99 had voted one way and 98 had voted the other way, you would have had a bill passed by 99 votes out of 393 in the House; and what precedents there are, both of the Supreme Court and of the Speaker—because Mr. Speaker Reed rendered an opinion—held that in a situation like this "two-thirds" meant two-thirds of those voting, provided it was a quorum.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask the indulgence of the Speaker for a moment, before he renders a decision; just a moment, Mr. Speaker. I am as much opposed to the adoption of this amendment as anyone, but I am also interested in having a correct decision made. I desire to say that, in my judgment, following the precedents of the House—and I have them before me—when it is held that two-thirds are required to adopt an amendment to the Constitution, they mean two-thirds of those present, a quorum being present. I refer the Speaker to the decision to be found in the fifth volume of Hinds' Parliamentary Precedents, section 7028 and following.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has those before him.

Mr. BARTLETT. It was held, as there reported, that the Constitution requires two-thirds of those voting when a quorum is present. I am interested, Mr. Speaker, in having a proper ruling, and I doubt not the Chair will make it and decide that it requires two-thirds to recede from our disagreement and to concur in this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated that the final act in submitting a constitutional amendment requires two-thirds, and this is the final act in submitting this amendment to the American people, so far as the House of Representatives and the Senate are concerned. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider and lay that motion on the table.

Mr. SISSON. One moment, Mr. Speaker. I have gone carefully into these precedents, and with the exception of the decision by Speaker Reed there is no precedent on this particular article of the Constitution. In every other case there was some limitation in the clause, like the one to which I called the attention of the Chair. But in this particular clause of the Constitution there is no such limitation, and article 5 was placed there for the purpose of guarding the instrument as it was passed. I can not get any construction or any language in any other clause of the Constitution that would warrant the decision reached by Speaker Reed, because this language is perfectly specific, and it hinges, of course, on what constitutes the House of Representatives.

There was quite a discussion in the House at the time, and quite a discussion in the Senate upon the passage of one of the amendments in the Senate, and it was then contended by the better lawyers in the Senate that it required two-thirds of that body to pass a constitutional amendment. But that was in the days when tempests were brewing and the majority was barely a majority; a quorum, but lacking a number of votes of being a majority of the entire Senate. That being true, if the Chair will examine carefully the precedents he will find that Speaker Reed's decision was the only decision in this House that holds that the words "the House of Representatives" mean that the House is made up only of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman and to the House that if the question had never been raised before, and Speaker Reed had never decided it, the present occupant of the Chair would decide it the very same way that Speaker Reed decided it. [Applause.] By the vote just taken the House votes to recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and to concur in the Senate amendment, two-thirds having voted therefor. [Applause.]

On motion of Mr. RUCKER of Missouri, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, is recognized.

HEIGHT OF BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2224) to amend "An act to regulate the height of buildings in the District of Columbia," approved June 1, 1910.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 and section 7 of the act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate the height of buildings in the District of Columbia," approved June 1, 1910, be, and they are hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. That from and after the date of approval of this act no combustible or nonfireproof building in the District of Columbia used or occupied or intended to be used or occupied as a dwelling, flat, apartment house, tenement, lodging or boarding house, hospital, dormitory, or for any similar purpose shall be erected, altered, or raised to a height of more than four stories, or more than 55 feet in height above the sidewalk, and no combustible or nonfireproof building shall be converted to any of the uses aforesaid if it exceeds either of said limits of height."

"SEC. 7. That for the purposes of this act the height of buildings shall be measured from the level of the sidewalk opposite the middle of the front of the building to the highest point of the roof. If the building has more than one front, the height shall be measured from the elevation of the sidewalk opposite the middle of the front that will permit of the greater height. No parapet walls shall extend above the limit of height except on nonfireproof dwellings, where a parapet wall or balustrade of a height not exceeding four feet will be permitted above the limit of height of building permitted under this act."

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

OSTEOPATHY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 19236) to regulate the practice of osteopathy in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be, and is hereby, created a board of osteopathic examiners, which will consist of five members, to be selected by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia from a list of 10 practitioners of osteopathy in the District of Columbia, said list to be furnished by the president of the Osteopathic Association of the District of Columbia, and shall include only such practitioners who are qualified as hereinafter provided. Such list shall be transmitted annually to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia under the seal of said association, and shall be signed by the president and secretary thereof, and the commissioners shall make further appointments to the board of osteopathic examiners from the list last submitted. In case of failure of said association to submit said list, the commissioners shall appoint members in good standing of said association without restriction: Provided, however, That said members shall be qualified as hereinafter required by graduation and practice. Within 30 days after the commissioners shall have notified the several members of their appointment, each member shall forward to said commissioners the following oath: "I do swear that I will faithfully perform the duties of a member of the board of osteopathic examiners for the District of Columbia to the best of my ability, so help me God," after which the commissioners shall issue to each of the examiners a certificate of appointment.

SEC. 2. That the members of said board first appointed, as hereinbefore provided, shall be practitioners of osteopathy of good moral and professional character, and graduates of colleges or schools of osteopathy recognized by the American Osteopathic Association, and that thereafter no person shall be eligible for such appointment unless, in addition to the qualifications hereinbefore prescribed, he has first obtained a license to practice osteopathy in the District of Columbia under the provisions of this act: Provided, That no member of said board shall hold said position while in any manner financially interested in any osteopathic school or college, or connected with the faculty or management of such school or college.

SEC. 3. That the term of office of the members of said board of osteopathic examiners of the District of Columbia shall be for a term of three years: Provided, That of the first members of the board two shall be appointed for one year, two for two years, and one for three years. Any vacancy that may occur from any cause shall be filled for the unexpired term by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia from the list last submitted as provided in section 1 of this act.

SEC. 4. That said board of osteopathic examiners of the District of Columbia shall within 30 days after its appointment organize by electing a president, a secretary, and a treasurer, who shall hold their offices until their successors are elected and qualified. The treasurer shall give bond with security in such sum as said board may determine. Said board shall make such regulations as may be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act. There shall be at least one regular meeting of said board each year, and this meeting shall be held in the city of Washington on the last Tuesday in June. Special meetings may be held upon the call of the president and two other members. A majority of said board shall constitute a quorum. Said board shall adopt a seal, keep a record of its proceedings, and a register of all applicants for license to practice osteopathy in the District of Columbia. Said register shall show the name, date of birth, and place of residence of each candidate and the name and location of the institution granting the applicant the degree of doctor or diplomate in osteopathy, the date of his or her diploma, and also whether the applicant was denied or granted a license, and the number of the license granted. The record and register shall be prima facie evidence of all matters recorded therein.

SEC. 5. That all fees provided for in this act shall be paid in advance to the treasurer of the board of osteopathic examiners of the District of Columbia, to be held as a fund for the use of said board. No funds shall be paid out except on a warrant signed by the president and secretary of said board, and no expense shall be created in excess of the fees and fines as herein provided, but such funds shall be applied by said board to the payment of its expenses and to making a compensation to each member thereof not to exceed $5 per diem for each day of actual service in the discharge of his duties under this act.

SEC. 6. That any person who was engaged in the practice of osteopathy in the District of Columbia on the 1st day of February, 1912, may deliver to the secretary of the board of osteopathic examiners of the District of Columbia within 90 days after the approval of this act a written application for a license to practice osteopathy in the District of Columbia, together with satisfactory proof that the applicant is not less than 21 years of age, is of good moral character, and had previously obtained a diploma from some legally incorporated and reputable school or college of osteopathy recognized by the American Osteopathic Association, and upon the payment of a fee of $10 said board shall issue to said applicant a license to practice osteopathy in the District of Columbia, which license shall have like effect for all purposes as a license issued after examination by said board of osteopathic examiners of the District of Columbia, as herein provided. Every license issued by said board shall be signed by each member of said board of osteopathic examiners and shall have affixed to it by the person authorized to affix the same the seal of said board of osteopathic examiners.

SEC. 7. That any person, other than as provided in the preceding section, who desires to enter on the practice of osteopathy in the District of Columbia from and after the approval of this act shall make a written application to the secretary of said board of osteopathic examiners for a license to practice osteopathy in the District of Columbia. Application shall be made upon a form prescribed by the board and shall be accompanied by a fee of $25, together with satisfactory proof that the applicant is at least 21 years of age, is of good moral character, and has obtained a preliminary education of at least a diploma from a high school of the first class or its equivalent, and has obtained a diploma from some legally incorporated and reputable school or college of osteopathy recognized by the American Osteopathic Association, provided such school or college prescribes a four-year course of at least eight months in each year as a prerequisite to its diploma in osteopathy. Upon complying with these conditions, said board of osteopathic examiners, if satisfied with the same, shall admit said applicant to examination before them, which examination shall include the subjects of anatomy, physiology, chemistry, toxicology, histology, pathology, bacteriology, diagnosis, hygiene, obstetrics, gynecology, surgery, medical jurisprudence, principles and practice of osteopathy, and diseases of the eye, ear, nose, and throat. If the examination is satisfactory to said board of osteopathic examiners, and the applicant shall have made an average of not less than 75 per cent upon all subjects examined upon, with not less than 65 per cent in any one subject, said board of osteopathic examiners shall issue forthwith to said applicant a license to practice osteopathy in the District of Columbia, when it shall have been recorded in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and the date and place of record has been certified thereon by said clerk; and the holder of the license shall pay to the clerk of said court a fee of 50 cents for making the record. The holder of said license shall, after the same has been recorded, exhibit the same at the health office, and shall register, in a book which the health officer shall provide for that purpose, his or her name and address. Whenever a license is revoked by said board of osteopathic examiners, the secretary thereof shall report that fact in writing to the clerk of said court and to the health officer of the District of Columbia, who shall thereupon cancel such registration. In case the applicant fails to pass a satisfactory examination, said applicant may, at any subsequent meeting of said board of osteopathic examiners within two years, have the privilege of a second examination without the payment of additional fee.

SEC. 8. That any applicant examined and licensed by the board of osteopathic examiners or other lawful authority of any State or Territory of the United States, and having practiced in the jurisdiction thereof for a period of at least one year, may, on personally appearing before and upon the payment of a fee of $25 to the board of osteopathic examiners of the District of Columbia, and filing with the secretary of the said board a copy of said license, certified by the affidavit of the president and secretary of the board granting said license, and upon showing also that the standard or requirement adopted by said board of examiners that issued said license is substantially the same as is provided by section 7 of this act, shall, without further examination, receive a license conferring on the holder thereof all the rights and privileges of this act.

SEC. 9. That the license provided for in this act shall authorize the holder to practice osteopathy as taught and practiced in the schools or colleges of osteopathy recognized by the American Osteopathic Association.

SEC. 10. That osteopathic physicians shall observe and be subject to all regulations of the District of Columbia relating to the control of contagious diseases, the reporting and certifying of births and deaths, and all matters pertaining to public health, and such reports shall be accepted and honored by the officers or department to whom the same are made.

SEC. 11. That the board of osteopathic examiners of the District of Columbia may refuse to grant a certificate to any person convicted of a felony, or of gross unprofessional conduct, or who is addicted to any vice to such a degree as to render him unfit to practice osteopathy, and may, after due notice and hearing, revoke such certificate for like cause.

SEC. 12. That any person who shall fraudulently practice or pretend to practice or use the science or system of osteopathy in treating diseases of the human body; who shall buy, sell, or fraudulently obtain any diploma, license record, or registration to practice osteopathy, or who shall use any of the forms or letters "Osteopath," "D. O.," "Osteopathic physician," or any other title or letters, either alone or with other qualifying words or phrases, under such circumstances as to induce the belief that the person who uses such term or terms is engaged in the practice of osteopathy, without having first complied with the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished for each offense by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $500, or by imprisonment in the District Jail for a period of not less than 10 nor more than 90 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That this act shall not apply to commissioned surgeons in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine-Hospital Service, nor to legally registered osteopathic physicians called from any State or Territory to attend specified cases in the District of Columbia, nor to practitioners of osteopathy during the period between the date of the approval of this act and the issue of license as provided by this act. It shall be the duty of the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia to prosecute all violations of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 13. That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent or in any way interfere with any person engaging in the art of healing in the manner taught by any school of medicine or science, except such as claim to be osteopaths or claim to practice osteopathy.

SEC. 14. That all acts or parts of acts, general or special, not in accordance with the provisions of this act be, and are hereby, repealed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "examiners," insert the words "for the District of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk reported the next committee amendment, as follow:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "the," strike out the words "president of the."

The Clerk reported the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 3, after the word "make," strike out the word "further" and insert the words "all future."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk reported the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 20, after the word "moral," strike out the words "and professional."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk reported the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 3, line 20, strike out the word "security" and insert the word "surety."

The Clerk reported the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 3, line 21, after the word "such," strike out the word "regulations" and insert the word "by-laws."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk reported the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 4, line 2, after the word "members," insert the words "of the board."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk reported the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 4, line 19, after the word "no," strike out the word "expense" and insert the word "debt."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk reported the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 5, line 19, strike out the words "each member" and insert the words "a majority."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question. Is it the intention to examine these practitioners and issue to them licenses, when only a majority of the board believe that the license should be issued?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; that was not the intention. The question has arisen as to another medical board here, that if any one of the five members should be absent in Europe or should be ill or away for any cause, a license could not be issued, and it is to cover situations of that kind that we have provided that a majority of the board may issue licenses.

Mr. FOSTER. So it is not the intention, if a minority of the board should decide that an applicant was not entitled to a license, the majority might issue it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; that was not thought of in the matter. It was only to provide against the absence or illness of members of the board.

Mr. FOSTER. There was one other matter about which I wished to inquire, and that was the striking out in line 20, page 2, of the word "professional."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That has gotten to be quite a question now, as to what constitutes ethics. It might be held by the board that it was unprofessional to advertise, and other little things of that kind, and the committee thought best to strike out the words "and professional."

Mr. FOSTER. So you just provide that the applicant shall be a practitioner of osteopathy of good moral character. This takes nothing into consideration as to the professional character of the applicant.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. We think the words "of good moral character" cover the ground sufficiently.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Amend, on page 6, by striking out, in lines 7, 8, and 9, the words "and has obtained a preliminary education of at least a diploma from a high school of the first class or its equivalent."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 6, line 16, after the word "examiners," strike out the words "if satisfied with the same."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 6, lines 22 and 23, strike out, after the word "if," the words "the examination is satisfactory to said board of osteopathic examiners and."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I notice the requirements outlined in section 7 are what might be termed very severe and not as applied to other branches of the medical profession, but possibly might be applied to the profession of osteopathy. I would like to inquire how many of the present practitioners of osteopathy in the District of Columbia the provisions of this bill would very likely preclude from securing permission to practice?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. None.

Mr. MILLER. I notice that those who are in practice at the date of January 1, 1912, are not obliged to submit to as severe an examination as the applicants hereafter are obliged to pass.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not think so.

Mr. MILLER. That is the provision of the bill; was there any special reason for that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Those who are already practicing are the graduates of some one of the schools provided for in this bill.

Mr. MILLER. Is it not a fact that there are a large number of osteopaths practicing in the District of Columbia who are really, as you might say, not first class?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This bill describes who is an osteopath, and all those who do not come under that description are not permitted to practice.

Mr. MILLER. How many schools now teach osteopathy that are equipped to qualify and graduate students to pass the examination prescribed here?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have no idea.

Mr. MILLER. Is it not a fact that there are just two?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not know.

Mr. MILLER. There is one at Kirksville, and I was wondering if this bill would really send osteopathic students to one of three schools.

Mr. LLOYD. There are several schools of osteopathy. The one at Kirksville is the parent school. There is one at Des Moines, one at Los Angeles, and several others.

Mr. MILLER. Are they all qualified to give this course of instruction?

Mr. LLOYD. There are many schools that are qualified and there may be some that are not, just the same as in the medical profession there are qualified schools and schools that a diploma would not be accepted from. I think there are six or seven osteopathic schools.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Under this bill a diploma itself does not entitle one to practice; they must have a diploma and pass this examination.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 7, line 10, by striking out the word "same" and inserting the word "original."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Amend, line 17, by striking out the words "a satisfactory" and inserting the word "the."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Amend, page 7, line 22, by striking out the words "examined and."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

On page 8, line 1, strike out the word "may."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

On page 8, line 17, after the word "all," insert the words "the laws and all legal."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Amend, page 8, section 11, line 25, by striking out, after the word "felony," the words "or of gross unprofessional conduct, or who is addicted to any vice to such a degree as to render him unfit to practice osteopathy."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, a question. Why is it provided in this section only for those who are convicted of a felony and nothing more?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. What more would the gentleman have?

Mr. FOSTER. I think it would be an unfortunate thing for a man to be practicing osteopathy or any other profession who is addicted to drugs or vicious habits.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is not a crime.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not talking about its being a crime, but I am talking about the granting of a certificate and revoking the same only upon the conviction of a felony.

Mr. BARTLETT. But a man who is convicted of a felony ought not to practice.

Mr. FOSTER. I believe that, too.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. When you get down to the vices, that becomes a different matter.

Mr. BARTLETT. Infirmities, either.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me a man who is addicted to vices, rendering him unfit to practice osteopathy, ought not to be permitted to practice.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But when you get into the question of vices, cigarette smoking, and things of that kind, you had better pass them along. Then, besides, there is ample protection in the bill as to their moral character, and all that.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; but you confine it to this one thing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And I suspect if you get out among the pill doctors with a provision like this that you would find just as many of those addicted to vices.

Mr. FOSTER. I agree with the gentleman, but I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that the law providing for the licensing of physicians provides more than this does.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes. I think it goes too far.

Mr. FOSTER. They are very restricted, much more than you restrict them in a bill of this kind.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But you are not restricting the other physicians more in the District of Columbia. These men do not make mistakes by writing the wrong prescription.

Mr. FOSTER. But you provide by saying an osteopathic physician is permitted to treat all manner of diseases.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; but they do not give any medicine.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly; but sins of omission sometimes are as great as sins of commission.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They may rub in the wrong place, that is all.

Mr. FOSTER. A man might be injured by the fact that he ought to have other treatment. I am not going to offer any amendment, although I think it is wrong to do that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This is the best we can do.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that is a mistake.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering District legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering District legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the motion.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 17681, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and ask unanimous consent that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas calls up the District of Columbia appropriation bill and asks that the Senate amendments be disagreed to, and that the House ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire, when that bill comes up, to have a separate vote on certain amendments. I have no objection to granting unanimous consent for the consideration of the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. That is not what the gentleman from Texas asked.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all the Senate amendments be disagreed to except Senate amendments 250 to 258, inclusive, and that those amendments be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. MANN. Except amendment No. 253.

Mr. BURLESON. Except amendment No. 253.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman's remark.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Texas to ask unanimous consent to disagree to all Senate amendments except 250, 251, 252, 254, 255, 256, 257, and 258.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the House disagree to all the Senate amendments on the District of Columbia appropriation bill except 250, 251, 252, 254, 255, 256, 257, and 258, and asks that those amendments be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report amendment No. 250.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 54, after line 17, insert:
"For the purchase of additional ground adjacent to the Corcoran School, for the extension of said school, to be immediately available, $11,000."

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House nonconcur, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes a preferential motion that the House concur, in Senate amendment No. 250. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report amendment No. 251.

Mr. BURLESON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Was the last motion equivalent to nonconcurring in the Senate amendment?

The SPEAKER. That is the rule. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment No. 251.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 54, before line 17, insert:
"Toward the construction of a new Central High School building, including grading and other work necessary to prepare the site for the building, and the total cost of said building, under a contract which is hereby authorized therefore, shall not exceed $725,000, $250,000."

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment. I am willing to consider that amendment and the next amendment together, if the gentleman desires.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the two amendments be considered together.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report amendment 252.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 67, after line 16, insert:
"Toward the construction of a new (colored) M Street High School, and the total cost of said building, under a contract which is hereby authorized therefor, shall not exceed $400,000, $150,000."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] moves to nonconcur in Senate amendments 251 and 252, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves to concur in the same. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to concur.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-nine Members are present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors——

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] moves that the House do now adjourn. That motion, under the circumstances, has to be seconded by a majority of those present.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I submit the Chair is mistaken about that. The motion to adjourn only has to be seconded after it has been defeated once in the House.

Mr. LEVY. I withdraw the motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. The motion to adjourn has to be seconded after it has been once defeated in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is correct, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] withdraws his motion to adjourn.

The Doorkeeper will cose the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of concurring in the amendments Nos. 251 and 252 will, as their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 76, nays 140, answered "present" 5, not voting 171, as follows:

AMERICA'S ORGANIZATION OF AUTOMOBILISTS,
"AMERICAN MOTORIST," OFFICIAL PUBLICATION,
NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS, 437 FIFTH AVENUE,
New York, May 13, 1912.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The growing demand for Federal aid in highways improvement is very clearly demonstrated in the numerous letters which are daily received at the national headquarters of the American Automobile Association from its 44 State associations and 340 affiliated local clubs, besides the thousands of individual members in all parts of the country.

The belief is quite general that the Federal Government should at least cooperate with the States in the construction of a comprehensive system of national highways.

Since we have progressed from the town to the county road, and from the county to the State road, the next logical step is the national or interstate road. Highways construction and maintenance within reason and of national scope is demanded. Hence we speak for a system of national routes which shall connect the various States and thus make possible at all times an interchange of commercial and social interests.

I would personally appreciate an expression of opinion as to your public position in this now most important avenue of Federal participation which we believe should enlist your thought and activities.

We are sending you under separate cover copy of the proceedings of the first annual Federal aid good roads convention held at Washington, January 16 and 17, believing that you will find therein much that will be of interest to you and perhaps be of value in defining the country-wide extent of the good-roads question.

Very truly, yours,

ROBERT P. HOOPER,
President American Automobile Association.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would like to make a suggestion and that it may be considered by Senators. It has seemed to me that communications from persons outside this body on general questions, newspaper articles, and speeches of others than Members of Congress ought to be printed in an appendix to the RECORD. I notice in picking up the RECORD, right in the beginning of a copy, when we refer to it for purposes of determining what we are to do and what we have done, we find pages of it taken up with outside communications. It may be all right to print them; I have not felt inclined to object; but I think it would be well for us to consider the question as to where they should be printed. They should be printed at the end of the day's proceedings under the title of appendix. I commend that to Senators for their consideration.

BILLS OF LADING.

Mr. POMERENE. I introduce a bill relating to bills of lading in commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. This is a redraft of Senate bill 4713, introduced by me some time ago. I ask that it may be printed and lie on the table and later I expect to offer it as a substitute for Senate bill 957, relating to bills of lading, reported by the Interstate Commerce Committee.

The bill (S. 6810) relating to bills of lading in commerce with foreign nations and among the several States was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will lie on the table.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CATRON submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the surveyor general of New Mexico from $2,500 per annum to $3,000 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill (H. R. 24023), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for experimental mail delivery from $100,000 to $300,000, intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 21279), which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to change the date for the promotion of clerks in class A to grade 3 from June 30, 1913, to June 30, 1912, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 21279), which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOSTER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,200 each for two clerks at charging desk, reading rooms, Library of Congress, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill (H. R. 24023), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PERSONNEL OF COMMISSIONS.

Mr. OVERMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 311), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate a statement of the number and personnel of commissions now in existence under congressional and executive authority, the salaries paid to members, officers, and employees of such commissions, and the individual and total expenses of each commission and member thereof for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911.

NAVY PAYMASTERS.

Mr. WETMORE. I move that the bill (S. 5214) to increase the number of paymasters and passed assistant and assistant paymasters in the United States Navy be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

POLICE AND FIREMEN'S RELIEF FUND.

Mr. GALLINGER. I enter a motion to reconsider the votes by which the bill (H. R. 20840) to provide for deficiencies in the fund for police and firemen's pensions and relief in the District of Columbia was ordered to a third reading and passed.

I move that the House be requested to return the bill to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

On May 11, 1912:

S. J. Res. 90. Joint resolution to authorize Capt. John W. Gulick, United States Army, to accept a position under the Government of the Republic of Chile;

S. 1524. An act to authorize the construction and maintenance of a dam across the Kansas River in western Shawnee County, or in Wabaunsee County, in the State of Kansas;

S. 5060. An act to provide for the disposal of the unallotted land on the Omaha Indian Reservation, in the State of Nebraska; and

S. 6167. An act to authorize the Williamson & Pond Creek Railroad Co. to construct a bridge across the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River at or near Williamson, Mingo County, W. Va.

SAVANNAH RIVER DAMS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5930) to extend the time for the completion of dams across the Savannah River by authority granted to Twin City Power Co. by an act approved February 29, 1908.

Mr. BACON. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment adopted by the House, ask for a conference thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. NELSON, Mr. BOURNE, and Mr. FLETCHER conferees on the part of the Senate.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17681) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. FOSTER conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 19236. An act to regulate the practice of osteopathy in the District of Columbia was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURNHAM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 18960, the agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], on page 23.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that amendment and offer in lieu of it the one I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The former amendment is withdrawn, and the Senator from North Carolina submits the following amendment in lieu thereof.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, in line 15, after the word "practice," add the words "and for farm demonstration work."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. In lines 15 and 16, I move to strike out the words "two hundred and fifty-one," before the word "thousand," and insert in lieu thereof the words "five hundred."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. After line 24, on page 23, insert:

That for the purpose of establishing an agricultural plant, shrub, fruit and ornamental tree, berry, and vegetable experimental station at or near the city of Mandan, west of the Missouri River, in the State of North Dakota; for the purchase of a suitable site and necessary farming land, to be selected by the Secretary of Agriculture; for the erection of buildings and other improvements to adapt such site to the purpose of making it an experimental farm to demonstrate the kind and character of plants, shrubs, and trees, berries, and vegetables best adapted to the climate and soil of the semiarid lands of the United States, and for the purchase of necessary stock and machinery, the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] to page 55. Yesterday the Senator moved to strike out, on page 55, after the heading in line 18, down to and including line 2, on page 56, and that motion was agreed to. The Senator particularly objected to the use of the words "in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word." There is no objection to those words going out, but striking out the paragraph is quite a serious matter, as it interferes with investigations in several other departments, the testing of drugs, paper for the Government Printing Office, and so forth. I will ask the Senator if he will not be willing to have that action reconsidered, and simply have the words to which the Senator particularly objected stricken out.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have no objection. My intention was to strike out those words. If more was included than would accomplish that purpose, I have no objection to the portion being restored.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, then, the vote by which the entire provision was stricken out is reconsidered, and the Senator from Idaho offers the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. In lines 22 and 23, on page 55, strike out the words "in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I offer several amendments to the bill, on pages 7 and 8, having one purpose in view, namely, the provision for the establishment of a weather station in the Saginaw Valley of Michigan. The peculiar conditions there have been recognized by the department, and the department has approved of this proposition. I offer the amendments which I send to the desk to effect that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan offers certain amendments, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 23, before the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "sixty-four" and to insert "sixty-nine," so as to read:

For the employment of professors of meteorology, inspectors, district forecasters, local forecasters, section directors, research observers, observers, assistant observers, operators, skilled mechanics, repairmen, station agents, messengers, messenger boys, laborers, and other necessary employees, $569,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 2, after the word "thousand," it is proposed to insert "five hundred," so as to read:

For fuel, gas, electricity, freight and express charges, furniture, stationery, and all other necessary supplies and miscellaneous expenses, $105,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 4, after the word "thereto," it is proposed to strike out "thirty-nine" and insert "forty-two," so as to read:

For instruments, shelters, apparatus, storm-warning towers, and repairs thereto, $42,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 10, after the word "grounds," it is proposed to strike out "ninety-eight" and to insert "ninety-nine," and in line 11, after the word "thousand," to strike out "five hundred," so as to read:

For rent of offices and repairs and improvements to buildings now completed and located outside of the District of Columbia, and care and preservation of grounds, including construction of necessary outbuildings and sidewalks on public streets abutting Weather Bureau grounds, $99,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 17, before the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "four" and to insert "five," so as to read:

For telephone rentals and for telegraphing, telephoning, and cabling reports and messages, rates to be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture by agreements with the companies performing the service, $305,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment. The portion of the bill between pages 28 and 48 was passed over. The Secretary will now read that portion of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN obtained the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I merely want to suggest that, in view of the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], we shall have to change the footing of the totals in lines 12 and 13, on page 9.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As a rule, the Senate at the conclusion of the consideration of a bill, by unanimous consent directs that the Secretary correct the totals to correspond with the amendments which have been made.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 70, line 10, it is proposed to strike out the word "two" in "class two," and insert "three," to read "class three."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, if it were within the rules, I should suggest the absence of a quorum in the Press Gallery. I am going to send out a message to the people that I should like to send through the press, but, if compelled, I will send it over their heads.

Mr. President, the largest question, so far as governmental policy and procedure are concerned, that Congress will be called upon to consider is that which I will, to the best of my ability, now present. We talk about conserving this and that, and I have been charged with being an enemy to conservation. It depends upon what you are conserving whether I am its friend or its enemy. I am going to speak in the interest of conserving opportunity to the people of this country, young and old. Opportunity is the most important asset that a man, woman, or child has at any period of existence. Opportunity was the underlying principle and basis that prompted the organization of this Government. It was the underlying motive or the controlling motive that brought the people across the sea to settle in the unknown land. Opportunity maintained them on the Atlantic coast and sent them drifting westward to a broadening field. It is involved in the consideration of this question. I shall not discuss minute details. I shall endeavor to keep out of my discussion any possible thought or expression of rancor or unconsidered opposition, but only, if I can have the attention—and I am sure I shall—of Senators, to set thought in the right direction.

A spoiler entered the field of opportunity a few years ago. I need not to attack the motives of the spoiler. I think it was an unconscious evil, but none the less deadly. The growing, increasing population of this country requires increased and increasing facilities for support. You withdraw a large per cent of the productive assets and then complain of the increase in the cost of living, just as though you would withdraw from the warehouses and from the markets 25 per cent of the assets upon which the people must exist and then complain that prices were higher. In the case of the forest reserves, we have withdrawn, first, the valuable asset of more than 100,000 young, vigorous, and capable men from industrial enterprise and placed them upon the pay roll of this institution. The withdrawal of 100,000 men from the productive fields of energy and enterprise is a serious question. It was suggested—at least I so gathered from a publication I saw some months ago—that Mr. Pinchot had stated as one of the purposes of such withdrawals that it would educate these men along military lines, educate them in discipline, and that they would be available as a reserve military force. I think I have gone to the limit in violation of my suggestion that I would keep this upon a high plane when I revert to that, but it comes to me as one of the vague and wild suggestions for which those against whom I speak to-day are responsible.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Did I understand the Senator from Idaho correctly to say that 100,000 men had been withdrawn from productive industry and placed upon the Government pay roll?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I made that statement. I gathered it from investigations during last night from sources that will commend themselves to the Senator as reliable.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is rather an amazing statement that 100,000 men are on the Government pay roll for conservation purposes, and I would like to have the Senator elucidate it.

Mr. HEYBURN. It does not follow that the withdrawal from the field of industry is confined to the single individual. The withdrawal of one man from gainful enterprise in this country results generally in the withdrawal of the opportunity from several others.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was more particularly dwelling upon the statement that 100,000 men had been placed upon the Government pay roll.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think, if the Senator will read my remarks or refer to them where he has doubt, he will find that I will have balanced my statements along the lines of accuracy when I have finished the presentation of any one of these subjects.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator allow me a word just there?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that the officer quoted by the Senator from Idaho—Mr. Pinchot—did say in a public address in this city, which has been published, bound, and sent out, that in order to properly administer the forests of this country would require a force not of 100,000, but of 117,000 men.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I read that statement, and I gave him the 17,000 men in order that I might be liberal.

You not only withdraw these young men—and they are young men, because they are not eligible after a certain period—from gainful enterprise to a field where they must be content with a limited income, but you withdraw 200,000,000 acres of land from production. I will be met, perhaps, with the response that that land is nonproductive. Then it need not be withdrawn for any purpose; it will take care of itself; its poverty will protect it. The fact is that the land withdrawn, 200,000,000 acres—and I am using round figures for convenience—is land capable of contributing to the productiveness of the country and the welfare of its citizens, and those responsible for withdrawing it dare not say that that is not true, else they admit that they have done a vain thing at a large expense.

It cost to administer this asset $22,440,000 last year. If the Government can justify itself in spending $22,000,000 to conserve that which is useless, I would be interested to know how it is to be done.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I merely wanted to ask the Senator a question in that connection. He says it cost $22,000,000 last year. Does not the Senator mean that it cost $22,000,000 from 1902 until 1912?

Mr. HEYBURN. I have a sheet, obtained this morning from the department, and I am going to give very accurate figures when I undertake to give accurate figures. In general speech I will deal in round numbers for convenience, and I will make these tables available to any Senator either during my remarks or afterwards.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the reason I called attention to the statement is because I have a statement from the same source in which it is set forth that the expenditure was $22,490,972.59 for the 10 years beginning in 1902, and I thought possibly the Senator had overlooked the date.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the total amount expended. I have the figures here for the total expended each year and then the aggregate. The Senator is correct—and if I said anything to the contrary it was an inadvertence—when he says that that covers from 1902 to 1911.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Inclusive.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. By this system of withdrawal you disturb the relation of the producer to the consumer, and then you complain of the increased cost of living. The assets of the producer in this country are land and labor, and I include the by-products in those classifications. When you withdraw so large a quantity of land you diminish the capital from which labor is to draw its opportunity and, consequently, you diminish the product, and thus you disturb the balance between these factors of government.

Solitude is never productive. If the law is obeyed, a forest reserve is a solitude; it is not a workshop; it is withdrawn from the settlement of men. It is a place under the guardianship or the immediate control of employees. No man who has given thought to the question will contend that the Government of the United States should itself engage competitively in business with its citizens, who are the Government. Unused land is not productive land. The idleness of most men is involuntary. I state these axioms as a sort of text for what I am going to say.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am very much interested in the statement the Senator has made about these hundred thousand men being used as soldiers in case of war. Do they drill them? Do they have uniforms? How do they expect to make soldiers out of these hundred thousand men?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not expect to; it was Mr. Pinchot who had that idea. I was merely citing it as a curiosity in literature and history.

Withdrawn opportunity is wasted opportunity. We waste the man, we waste the land, and we destroy the opportunity and we pay for it. Last year we paid something over $6,000,000.

We were told in 1904, when I first had thrust upon me the duty of discussing this question—and it was new—that after the next year at most this service would be self-sustaining. There are Senators here who well remember that promise. They demonstrated it to the line—that is, to the line of their satisfaction—that it would be not only a great conservation of natural resources but a system that would yield a steady income to the Government. Those two propositions have diverged every year. The deficit has been greater every year.

Mr. OVERMAN. I remember that statement being made upon the floor, that it would be self-sustaining. Would the Senator tell us what was the revenue for last year?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will just take this occasion to give you the revenue and the expenditures for each year since that time. That was in 1904. We gave this department $348,773.31 to investigate this question. That was in the appropriation act of 1904. In the appropriation act of 1905 we gave them $348,539.09 for the same purpose, and in addition to that we gave them for the administration, protection, et cetera, of the national forests—and et cetera is the largest item in the bill—$288,516.86, and for permanent improvements in national forests we gave them $2,762.18, making for the year 1905, $639,818.13, as against $348,773.31 for the year in which the promise was made.

The income in the year 1904 was $58,436.19, leaving as a deficit the difference between $350,000 and $58,000.

Again, they renewed their promises in 1905 and said that it was merely due to the weather or some such contingency that they had not made good their promises, but if we would give them the opportunity they surely would the next year. So we gave them $642,187.68, very nearly double the appropriation of 1904, but they were going to do better work. The income that year was $73,276.15 against the expenditure of $642,000.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. Is it not a fact that they expended their income as well as the amount appropriated by Congress?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; in those years. But we stopped it.

Mr. FALL. Does the Senator say we have stopped it?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. In that year we compelled them to turn it into the Treasury. They were receiving the money and violating the Constitution by paying it out without an appropriation.

Mr. FALL. Does the Senator state that that has been stopped?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; they must now turn the money into the Treasury.

Mr. FALL. Is it not a fact that they draw the money out of the Treasury, expend it, and then come before Congress for additional appropriations? In other words, is it not a fact that, while we appropriate $5,000,000 in this bill for the service, the income will be spent also?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is true, in a measure.

Mr. FALL. That is true, I know, in reference to one of the States.

Mr. HEYBURN. We are beginning to run into larger figures now. In 1906 the cost of maintaining the forests, for which we appropriated, was $1,191,400.21, and the receipts were $767,219.96. In 1907 their expenditures were $1,827,189.51 and their receipts were $1,571,059.44. But in 1908 when the great contest over this question was waged in Congress, and they were defiant as they never had been before, and when they held the reins in their hands and drove it under the lash, we gave them $3,458,790.83, and we gave them a million of it just by putting it on, without accounting for it. It was an amendment offered by my colleague who sits on my right when he is here. I do not mean my colleague from the State of Idaho. After we had given them until we were breathless, it was suggested to give them another million, and it was tossed up in the air and the Secretary was told to catch it and do what he pleased with it. That was the high tide of forest reserves. In that year we gave them $3,458,000 instead of $1,827,000 the year before, and they expended $1,842,281. We gave them financial dyspepsia. They could not digest the money we gave them, and when the Forest Service gets so bad that it can not digest an entire appropriation there is something wrong with both.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator from Idaho criticize the Forest Service for closing the year with an unexpended balance? Would he expect the service to expend money unless it was necessary? Is it not to the credit of the service that they had an unexpended balance?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am neither giving credit to nor taking away credit from the Forest Service. I am stating the facts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator is criticizing——

Mr. HEYBURN. I may in the closing moments of my observation, and it would be based largely upon the sentiment expressed by the Senator. I am speaking of the manner of administration in an impersonal way.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It strikes me that to close the year with an unexpended balance is to the credit of the Forest Service, and justifies the confidence reposed in them.

Mr. HEYBURN. If there is anything for which they are entitled to credit I am glad of it.

That was in 1908. We gave for administration, protection, et cetera, $2,526,098.02. Most of that was under the last enumerated item, et cetera. They sold timber in that year to the amount of $849,027.24. If I had time I should like to go into and analyze what they call sales of timber, but I have not time this morning. But in that year they collected for grazing and other uses $993,254.63.

They collected that for the use of lands that were not forest lands at all. They collected that from land which should have been open to settlement by the American citizen.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am sure the Senator from Idaho does not want to misstate the fact in reference to that. Much of this land that is used for grazing is within the forests and on the mountain side.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have been through the forests in the State of Oregon many times, as well as those in my own State, and I know grass grows to some extent in the forests. I know that the official report of the Forestry Department made four years ago stated that one-third of the land in forest reserves had no timber at all upon it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I can speak with knowledge with reference only to my own State, and nearly all the reserves are forest lands, and they are rented for grazing purposes, both in the Cascade and the coast ranges.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator from Oregon will allow me, we can trade him 11,000 acres in our State that has been set aside for a forest reserve on which there is not a stick of timber on any portion of it, with the exception of possibly in the crevices in some parts. There there are some old cedars that scientists, so I am informed, say are about 3,000 years old, and they are about 6 inches in diameter—the largest ones. So I do not know how long it is going to take to reforest that section.

I simply add that to the information about the quantity of timber on land that is reserved as forest reserves, and I say frankly that I know that country, and I know there is no timber whatever on a single acre of it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will permit me for a moment, I do not mean to say that there are not lands embraced within these reserves, so called, that have no timber on them. The point I made had relation to the statement of the Senator from Idaho that this money was received from lands which were not timbered at all. I say, as a matter of fact, most of these moneys that are received for grazing purposes are received from lands within the forest reserves, and they are covered with timber as a matter of fact; at least, that is the fact in my State; and I think it is largely true in Washington and Idaho as well.

Mr. HEYBURN. I referred specifically to the lands reported as nontimbered, one-third of the area.

Now, the comparison of the year 1907 and 1908 is instructive. It cost about $50,000 more to investigate in 1908 than it did in 1907. This term "investigation" includes sending men around to towns lying adjacent to apparently timbered lands which can be seen upon the mountains, and inquiring in some places where men meet as to whether or not that land has timber on it. Some old settler will say, "The finest timber you ever saw. I shot a bear there last winter." That is their report.

Now, the "et cetera" item increased between 1907 and 1908—it nearly doubles—from $1,400,000 in round figures to $2,500,000. That is this indefinite expenditure of which we compelled them for the first time to render an account two years ago, if I remember correctly, upon the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Maine, Mr. Hale.

Now the permanent improvements begin to cut a figure. They are building themselves homes. When I say "themselves" I do not refer to the American citizen who is seeking a home upon which to keep his family and reside and perform the duties and obligations of citizenship, but I mean these single men from whom we have nothing to expect in the way of growth of population or wealth or anything else, who receive a salary and spend it and add nothing to the benefits of the country, except from an artistic point of view, as they move about clad in their peculiar green uniform with a little red cock feather in their hats. From an artistic standpoint they are worth something, but not enough to justify this sacrifice.

Now, listen to this comparison: For permanent improvements in national forests, 1908, $592,169.19. In 1909 it was $599,471.02. That is when they found themselves with the reins in their hands and they were moving along with a rush. In 1907 it was only $78,788.27 for that item; in 1906, it was only $23,521.28; and in 1905, $2,762.18, and yet in that one year between 1907 and 1908 they jumped from $78,000 to $592,000.

It is under the head of "permanent improvements in national forests." What do you want to improve a solitude for? What do you want to improve lands that are never to be opened to settlement for?

Why do you want to build telephone and telegraph lines and roads and trails and maintain steam launches and automobiles—I am not exaggerating—to travel around in this solitude of to-day and to-morrow and forever? There is no promise comes from them that they ever intend that these forest lands, as they call them, shall be opened to settlement.

Mr. President, more than half mankind have elected to settle in forests. When they have gone to new countries, all the nations of the earth, as they have wandered about from the beginning, have selected the timberlands in which to make their homes. Yet here is a bureau that assumes to say that you shall not live in the shade of the trees, but you must go out upon the sun-baked plain and make your home.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does not the Senator from Idaho realize that the exciting cause for this strong movement for the preservation and conservation of these forests, assets belonging to the people, was the fact that millions of acres had been obtained from the Government in many cases through fraud and in almost every case at an utterly inadequate price, and that the timber had then been ruthlessly cut from the land and the asset practically destroyed? And is it not a fact——

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me answer that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not a fact that every civilized nation in the world, ahead of the United States, has taken steps and is now pursuing a policy for the preservation of its great forests?

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to have answered those questions separately. I am afraid I may confuse them. The first one, as to the incentive for entering upon this system, is exactly on a par with the man who, finding that some one has stolen the apples from one of the trees in his orchard, goes out and cuts down the whole orchard. That is the idea.

Now, in the first place, we had the facts tabulated—I think the Senator from Wyoming had them here upon the last occasion when this question was discussed—showing that less than 3 per cent of all the charges, such as have been suggested by the Senator from Nebraska, proved upon trial to be without foundation. Less than 3 per cent of the people charged with those offenses were found to be guilty of them upon trial. That was thrashed out very thoroughly and completely, and I will only enter into it by reference.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will ask the Senator in this connection if it is not a fact that under the act of 1907, which repealed the indemnity selection provisions of the law, there was reserved to the Santa Fe Railroad system the right to issue their scrip for the forestry lands if they saw fit to use it, and to open up these lands to entry by scrip of the Santa Fe Railroad system?

Mr. HEYBURN. I was so much aware of it at the time as to have Idaho reserved from the provisions of the act.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] referred to certain scrip or the right of the Santa Fe Railroad Co. to make lieu-land selections. When the historian shall write the history of Arizona, if it be an impartial history, he must write down that a former Secretary of the Interior looked on and, without any protest, saw perpetrated the most stupendous graft and spoliation of public timber that was ever perpetrated in the history of the Nation, and in the following manner:

Under the act of June 4, 1897, those persons who owned lands within a forest reserve were permitted to surrender their lands to the Government and select an equal area of land elsewhere. The Santa Fe Railroad Co., sometime the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co., by virtue of its grant of land granted by Congress to its predecessors on July 26, 1866, owned every alternate section through northern Arizona 40 miles on either side of its railroad track.

That railroad company and its grantees denuded its lands of the timber, stripped the lands until they were as bare of timber in some places as is this floor; then this company and its grantees surrendered this denuded land to the United States and selected Government timbered land elsewhere in lieu of the land surrendered. This right to make these lieu-land selections caused the bare and denuded lands belonging to the railroad company and its grantees to rise to the speculative value of from seven to ten dollars per acre. After all the Government timbered lands that could be selected were selected by this railroad company and its grantees and, as usual, the railroad company made much money by the exchange, then, too late, of course, for any practical good to the American people as a whole, the lieu-land selection act was repealed; thus, practically, under the permission of the Government's bureaucrats, some of whom are now claiming to be the true conservators of the people's forests, by silence assisted or did not object, although vigorous protests were made by Arizona citizens and by her then Delegate in Congress, and in order to accentuate, emphasize, and point out the wickedness of this graft and spoliation, a delegation of 8 or 10 of Arizona's citizens came here and personally protested to the then Secretary of the Interior without avail.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator speaks from intimate knowledge, doubtless, of the subject of which he speaks. I regret that he should announce that he seldom agrees with me, because I had hoped that we would act in harmony and unison here for the best interests of legislation.

I want to refer to the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] with reference to the moving cause for the creation of these reserves, in which he said that it was because the law was being violated and that seemed to be the best way of meeting the condition. It would be a humiliating concession to make, that we could not enforce the law against dishonest men, even though there might have been less or more than the 3 per cent of rejected claims. I hope the day will never come when we will fly from the duties of Government and its responsibilities because of the inefficiency of our agencies to enforce the law. That will not do for a reason.

There was another reason than that. I am going to keep just as close to the facts as history will compel and enable me. There had in this country grown up great combinations of capital engaged in the lumber business and timber-land business. One of them is or was the other day, when I received a letter on the stationery of the concern, vice president of the National Conservation Association or Congress. I think the President of the United States was stated to be the president of it. But the associates of this vice president were men, at least some of them, engaged in the same enterprise as the vice president. They had acquired hundreds of thousands of acres, I would be safe in saying millions of acres, of the timber lands through various forms of manipulation. They had enough to enable them to control the retail market of the United States for a very long period. They thereafter sought to rid themselves of competition. The question was, How can we do it? Here are these bright, enterprising young men coming into the forests with their portable sawmills, coming here with a little capital to build up the lumber enterprise. How can we get rid of them? We dare not kill them. We must get rid of them. These young men were going in. Twelve hundred of them came into our State during those days. Those young men were sharp competitors in the retail market of this great concern, that owned—now my mind has been gathering up the facts—that owned millions of acres of our best timber land, selected through cooperation and agencies that enabled them to get what no other man could get. That was the Weyerhaeuser Co.

I do not believe in withholding candor in these cases. They said, "We must get rid of competition," and they then, through plausible argument and sophistry and neglect, secured the enactment of the first forestry-reserve law. That closed up an area of country as large as one of the States in the United States. That was the Bitter Root forest concern, the first one created. That was the beginning.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How many acres of land did the Senator say the Weyerhauser syndicate controlled?

Mr. HEYBURN. I first stated hundreds of thousands. I then cast my mind, as I was speaking of the subject, and I felt justified in saying millions of acres.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator explain how the Weyerhaeuser syndicate procured that forest land which formerly belonged to the Government of the United States?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. In the first place, after the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. had cut over the Mount Rainier Forest Reserve to a large extent, they then secured the privilege of exchanging that land through the means of having a forest reserve created, and the law enacted in connection with it gave them the right to select an equivalent quantity of land elsewhere. That land passed largely into the hands of the Weyerhaeuser syndicate. The Weyerhaeuser syndicate has more heads and more tails to it that any other animal that has yet been discovered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me ask the Senator this question: Suppose that Government timberland originally, instead of being permitted to pass into the hands of the Weyerhaeuser syndicate and other lumber speculators for a mere song, had been retained as Government property and the timber sold off in a scientific process, as is now the practice in Germany, would not the country have been much better off? In other words, would we not have been better off if we had adopted a policy of conservation before we did instead of at so late a date?

Mr. HEYBURN. We would not have been worse off than we are now. But a comparison with Germany immediately arrests my zeal in any discussion. If I thought as well and as highly of the conditions in Germany and in regard to other foreign countries frequently mentioned, I would go there; I would not remain here a day. If they had a better tariff system, a better forestry system, a better agricultural system, I would go there. But they have not. There is not another country on earth that has any system as good as that which is in the uses of the American people and that will be realized to them when they have time to work out the problems.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator seems to blame the conservation system, or, if you please, the national forest reserve system, for the immense holdings of the Weyerhaeuser people. I will ask if it is not a fact that Congress itself is rather to blame in that when it authorized the location of a reserve and put in it the express provision that the railroad company might through its indemnity scrip have selection in other places than the logged-over land they cut?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator reverses the proposition. As to the large holdings of the Weyerhaeusers, I use them only as representative of a class. I could name 40, or at least 20, others here. When the Senator says that I charge the forest-reserve system with the existence of those people, that is the opposite of the proposition. I charge the forest-reserve system with those people or to them; they are responsible for it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. In addition to what the Senator from Oregon has said, we have to go back even further than the inauguration of the forestry system to find where there could be large accumulations of the timberlands. We have to go back to the law which authorized the transcontinental railroad land grants, which gave the railroads the alternate sections—in some cases 20 miles on each side of the railroad and in other cases 40. It was easy for those men to accumulate great timber holdings there. That was the commencement of it, and that is one of the factors which led into the perhaps foolish legislation which permitted the exchange of which the Senator from Oregon has spoken, because in laying out a timber reserve one-half of the land in a railroad limit belonged to the railroad, and in order to control it all we took this not wise way of allowing the railroad to pass in its lands in this reserve and take in exchange timberlands outside of the railroad limits.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Along that same line I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Oregon to the fact that so far as my recollection goes not one of these exchanges has been made except upon the request and recommendation of the Forest Service.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is a fact, nevertheless, that when under the forest-reserve system that exists to-day this looting of the public domain by corporations, as has been done in the past by men of the Weyerhaeuser stripe—and I do not mean to charge that they have obtained their lands illegally—can be done in the future, and Congress itself is to blame, rather than the men who have administered the Forestry Department, for the large holdings that people have acquired. For instance, when the Rainier National Forest was created in the State of Washington there was expressly granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. the right to release its lands in the reserve to the Government of the United States and to select other lands in lieu thereof.

Mr. HEYBURN. But not to cut the timber off first.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; with the result that after they had cut the timber off they released to the Government of the United States 500,000 acres of land at one time, and most of the lands selected in lieu of it were in my State and it was the best land we had in the State.

So it was not the administration of the Forest Service that enabled that to be done, Mr. President, but it was Congress itself. Congress in 1907, when it pretended to repeal these indemnity selection laws, reserved to the Santa Fe system the right to exercise that right still further, and that stands as the law to-day.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I would just like to say a word because it will be appropriate here.

I am not complaining of anybody but Congress. The Senator says if anyone is to blame it is Congress. I am talking to Congress, and if I am implying blame it is directed against Congress.

Mr. Weyerhaeuser personally is as affable and pleasant a gentleman that you could meet in the world and so are those who speak for him. I have no personal feeling against him or antipathy toward him at all. I am not condemning persons, but I must refer to the things which they have accomplished, or sought to accomplish, in order to address myself at all to the subject.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In this connection, Mr. President, if I may once more interrupt the Senator, the birth of the indemnity selection law is as well understood by the Senator as it is by other people who have read on the subject. It was in the railroad office, if I mistake not, although it was pretended to have had its birth in a desire to protect the innocent homesteader within the forests. After he had secured the right and after he had exercised the right under a law to release his homestead in the forest and to take up lands of equal value elsewhere, we find that these big companies who had the immense railroad grants thought that they were entitled to the same protection that the innocent homesteader was entitled to, and they prevailed upon Congress——

Mr. HEYBURN. That was the origin of it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. To give them the same right, and they did get it from Congress.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am not quite through with the question as to the responsibility or the reason. It would be a slander upon our judicial system and those who administer the law through the courts to say that we were not capable of enforcing laws, and it would be a slander upon Congress to say that Congress was not sufficiently intelligent and brave to enact the laws to be enforced. The fact is that this country never will flee from the wrongdoer because of the success of the wrongdoer in accomplishing his purpose.

Mr. President, I was in a most interesting part of this table where we began to build the luxuries of the service. Just in that one year for permanent improvements in national forests we appropriated enough to erect some of the big public buildings needed in the city of Washington, and for whom? For citizens of the United States engaged in industrial enterprise calculated to build up and support our civilization? No; but for the building of roads and trails in the silent land, the building of telephone lines in order that these men may communicate promptly with each other, telegraph lines, electric launches upon the lakes, and, now, I understand for automobiles. That is what we are appropriating the money for to maintain this silent land, this nonproductive land, except for the pitiful sum that we receive for grazing sheep and selling a few thousand feet of lumber.

The idea of the Government of the United States undertaking to fix the price of lumber in the United States by going into the lumber business in competition with the citizenship of the country! That is what they are doing, or trying to do. Since the enactment of the law of 1904 they have advanced the price of lumber 100 per cent.

Mr. President, mark the sweep forward of this business. I was speaking of 1908, when they spent $2,526,098.02 for the administration, protection, and so forth, of national forests. In 1909 they added $400,000 to that great sum and spent $2,955,425.01; in 1910 they increased that amount to $3,752,316.91, and in 1911 to $5,335,886.97. That is the last year of which we have reports. That is for what I call the "fancy work" of the department—the building of houses and the building of roads upon which there is nobody to travel.

Mark you at this point, they pay no taxes in the State of Idaho. They throw a dole to our treasury of a small sum of money not worth mentioning out of the receipts from timber sales. We would rather have our own than to have this charity.

They undertake to specify the purpose for which this money that they give shall be used, forsooth, in violation of our State constitution, which says that these moneys may be used only for certain purposes; that is, for educational purposes. They assume to say—this department over here clothed in green assumes to say—that we shall spend it in violation of our constitution, and that we must spend a part of it for public roads. That is their contribution to citizenship and the maintenance of our State, and of other States as well.

Mr. President, they have withdrawn this land from taxation yesterday, to-day, and forever; they have withdrawn it from settlement, nowithstanding that within the scope of these withdrawals there were 85 public schools maintained according to the laws of our State; that many communities around those schools are to be shut off from the outside world, with the knowledge that no increase of value could come to their homes or other property because of isolation; that many communities in the State have been shut off from the opportunities of growth and advancement that come from larger community life. They did it as ruthlessly as the brigand takes his toll, and they call us cranks and enthusiasts because we dare to stand up for the rights we have under the law.

I am gratified that this morning so many Members of this body have given and are giving their attention to the consideration of this great question. It affects not only those who have cast their lot in that land, but it affects those from whose households and communities our young men come. The surplus sons of the East find their outlet of opportunity in that country. They are entitled to the right that these lands shall be open and free to their appropriation and lawful use. That right exists not only in the young men of the West, but it exists in the young men of the East, whose only hope or destiny in the field of prosperity lies there. We do not plead alone for the growing and increasing youth of our country in the West, but for the youth of all the country, East and West.

We were reminded yesterday and this morning that these lands belonged to all the people. Then, if they do, the duty rests upon all the people for their administration; the duty rests as much upon the inhabitant of the State of Massachusetts or of New York or of Virginia as upon those who dwell in that country, because it is the opportunity for your sons which we are seeking to protect as well as for our own.

You say that you are entitled to participate in the legislation; that you must have your toll from every dollar collected for the use of these lands or every dollar received as the value of those that are disposed of. Then come to the front and do your duty; study this question; make it a live, responsible duty, and participate with us who are more immediately connected with the subject in settling these questions right.

Has the American continent grown too large; is the United States too vast in extent for those opportunities to be developed upon which rest the future greatness of our country? No man will assert it or admit it. We need these lands to-day and we will need them to-morrow; we need them for the opportunities they afford to our citizens to settle and make homes; we need them because of the revenue they will pour into the General Treasury; we need them as the hotbeds of new industries undreamed of to-day. You have needed them in the past. When the National Treasury was bankrupt, when the printing press was the only security behind the money in the country, the States which to-day are sometimes ridiculed because of their size and population poured a golden stream into the arteries of the Nation.

From the single State of Nevada, between 1861 and 1865, $400,000,000 were poured, not in promises from the printing press but in yellow gold, the basis of commerce, the stability of our wealth. During those same years the State of Idaho poured over $200,000,000 into the coffers of the country to sustain it in its need. Practically all the money base that you have came from these States that you would now wrap in darkness, that you would turn over to the salaried man who is not there to make a home for himself or for anyone else. These are the great States.

In looking through an old book I found some lines that years and years ago attracted my attention, and I have them here. You will recognize them. They were written when we were forming States; they were written by an Englishman when we were learning how to make a country and a government, when we were inquiring as to what constitutes a State. He wrote these lines during the days when our Constitutional Convention was sitting to consider what constitutes a State. Sir William Jones, better known in that day than this, wrote:

What constitutes a State?
Not high-raised battlement or labored mound,
Thick wall or moated gate;
Not cities proud with spires and turrets crowned;
Not bays and broad-armed ports,
Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride;
Not starred and spangled courts,
Where low-browed baseness wafts perfume to pride.
No! men, high-minded men,
With powers as far above dull brutes endued
In forest, brake, or den
As beasts excel cold rocks and brambles rude,
Men who their duties know,
But know their rights, and knowing, dare maintain,
Prevent the long-aimed blow,
And crush the tyrant while they rend the chain;
These constitute a State.

The men who go into those new States to take advantage of the opportunities they afford constitute the State. The mountains and the streams and the water power and the forests were there when the birds sang in the morning, and yet they were dead as the clay upon which they rested. It was only when man, with his enterprise, his necessities, and his ambition, touched them with the wand of industry that they started out of those beds of clay and became States.

I think sometimes, when I contemplate the relation that those States have borne to the General Government in the production of substantial wealth, of the story of the mouse and the lion; and yet you have reduced them to the degradation of pasture fields for sheep and cattle at so much a head. You have preferred the beasts to the men; you have reduced them to a condition of vassalage, where a man must ask and beg for what is his right.

You can not walk across a forest reserve or drive a team across it without the consent of these men. I speak with knowledge; I speak with the facts in my mind of a man emigrating from one section of this country to another with his family in the white covered wagon, who was taken up by a forester with the demand that he pay for the grass upon which his tired teams pastured in the evenings. Of course I do not undertake to place all of the blame for the little idiosyncracies of this kind upon those who sit at Washington in luxurious quarters and are a part of the Government of the United States, but I speak of them as the natural and necessary outcome of a system that undertakes to compel your peers to ask for their rights at the hands of these men. An American citizen, so far as his rights under the law are concerned, is each the peer of the other. There ought to be no time, no place, no circumstance under which he would be compelled to doff the cap or bend the knee in order to enjoy his rights.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I sympathize with the Senator from Idaho in his desire to break this deadlock that exists in the West with reference to the development of our natural resources, and I have long thought that the Senators and Representatives from the dozen States that comprise that region should get together and frame a code of laws which they could present to Congress, backed by their united judgment, with a view to breaking that deadlock.

There is no one more familiar with the land laws of the United States and the general condition of the public domain than is the Senator from Idaho, and I ask him what he would recommend in the shape of present legislation. I assume that he would wish that all these withdrawals of the public domain should be terminated and the entire public domain opened up to entry under United States laws.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, will the Senator permit me here——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would ask him whether he would like that to be accomplished under existing land laws or would he prefer to change those land laws so as to meet the economic conditions in the West?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will give the Senator some light right here.

In the first place he asks if I would like to have public land opened up. Land that is not opened up is not public land under the decision of the Secretary of the Interior. Land that is withdrawn for any purpose ceases to be public land. That is the alleged law, and it is a law from which the poor individual can not appeal or find relief.

I would have these lands public lands, because of the fact that they belong to the public and to all of it. I would make it possible for every member of the great community which we call the public to reach out and participate in them, and I would make it as a penalty if he did not reach out and participate in them, that he could not prevent some one else from doing it.

It is, as I said in the beginning, a large question. It has become such because of mistake after mistake in legislation and in administration. A great deal of the difficulty grows out of the administration.

A few months ago in this Congress we enacted a law providing that the State of Idaho might buy a certain piece of ground containing beautiful lakes and streams for a public park, not giving it to them, but the State to pay the price assessed or levied upon it. That is all there was of it. The law provided that the Secretary of the Interior should make a deed of conveyance in the nature of a patent to the State of Idaho upon the State paying the price of that land.

What did they do? They wrote into that patent, in violation of the law and their duty, restrictions that in effect leave that land a part of the United States, notwithstanding that the State of Idaho has paid for it. They wrote it in there because they held the pen and had the power. Had I known the restrictions were being written into that patent I would have perhaps found some way of stopping the hand of the despoiler.

But it is one of the defiant things in keeping with the maladministration of the laws that we enact. Who ever dreamed, when the law was enacted, of the interpretation that would be placed upon the lieu-lands law? They kept creeping forward and forward a little more each time, until by and by we found that part of the public domain serenely in the hands of the combination that one forest preserves, because they are their own private laws, because they relieve them against competition. They want those laws to enable them to advance the price of lumber, control it, and they can cut it down or raise it. They are talking now of establishing sawmills in all these forests and going regularly into the business of cutting lumber and selling it to those who would purchase and use it in competition with those in the business.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand the Senator from Utah to say that, in the first place, he would really make these lands public lands, which means, I suppose, that he would end all these withdrawals and reservations and throw open the entire public domain to entry under some kind of law.

I wish to ask him—and I do not suggest it at all in the spirit of antagonism, but simply in the spirit of helpfulness—assuming that all these obstacles to the entries of the public domain were withdrawn, all these reservations and withdrawals done away with, whether he would rest content with the existing land laws; that is, the laws under which future entries of these lands could be made with a view to reducing them to private ownership?

I ask him, further, whether he would make any reservations to the public, and if so, what; and if he concluded that it was wise to make some reservations to the public, whether he would have that reservation run to the National Government or to the local State government?

It seems to me, in order to solve this question, it is essential that we of the West should point out definitely the line of legislation which we think desirable. We can hardly expect to break this deadlock unless we present to Congress some definite scheme of legislation under which these entries can be made, or, on the other hand, declare that we are entirely satisfied with the land laws as they now exist and that they need no amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I realize the importance of the Senator's remarks, but it is not necessary to decide, in discussing this question, whether or not I would favor a change or any change in the law. I believe I could safely leave that to the intelligence of those who will legislate upon this subject. I do know this, however, that for a century we failed to discover the necessity of reserving a great part of the public lands to public officers. This land is not reserved to the people. It is reserved to use of the public officers who occupy it and get paid for it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In this connection I desire to call attention to a statement I have received from the Forester in relation to releasing from the reserves lands suited for agricultural purposes.

In district 2, with headquarters in Denver, about 37 per cent of the tracts listed for entry under the forest homestead act have either not been entered at all or have never been settled upon.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is easy to answer.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator know the reason why?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Because the lands are not suited for agricultural purposes. A man can not make a living upon them.

Mr. BORAH. No man wants another to go upon a piece of land and determine for him whether or not he could make a farm of it. The farmer wants to determine for himself whether or not he can make a farm upon it and not have it determined by some other person.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. These lands are listed as fitted for agricultural purposes.

Mr. BORAH. By whom?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. By the department.

Mr. BORAH. If you should see the men who go out to determine that fact you would not blame the proposed settler for wanting to determine that fact for himself.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In New Mexico 22 per cent of the tracts listed have not been filed on at all, although they have been listed as lands fitted for agricultural purposes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator allow me one comprehensive word? They will not be settled upon, because the settler does not seek an opportunity to make a home in an isolated place, where there never can be any such surroundings as should surround an American community.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. What I have said goes to the statement made by the Senator that these lands are withheld from settlement, although fitted for agricultural purposes.

Mr. HEYBURN. No. It was foolish to withhold them, and it is foolish to expect that any man will enter upon land where he can not have a neighbor within 50 miles.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In the Senator's own State at least 13 per cent of the lands listed for agricultural settlement have not been taken.

Mr. HEYBURN. At least 13 per cent?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; that is what the Forester claims.

Mr. HEYBURN. And a good many times that, and they will not be taken.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I insist that if the Senator's contention were sustained by the Senate and these lands were absolutely released—and that is the proposition his argument leads to—it would lead men to take up for agricultural purposes land that is not fitted for such purposes, and it would be taken up by persons in many cases for speculative purposes entirely.

Mr. BORAH. How are these lands released?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They are not released, but they are listed in the department as suitable for agricultural purposes.

Mr. BORAH. They are not released at all, and the settler knows when he goes there that it can be taken away from him. I know of instances where people have worked upon their lands one or two or three years and have been told by representatives of the department that they are not good farmers, and the farms are not good farms, and they can not have them for that purpose.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am willing to concede that the Senator is correct and that there are some lands in national forests that can be used for agricultural purposes. But if land has been listed for such purposes by the department and can not be sustained as homesteads, and if other land which has been so listed is not entered by settlers, it should be disposed of by the Government as its wisdom hereafter dictates.

Mr. HEYBURN. Who is the Government? The settler in a forest is as much a part of the Government as any other citizen.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Congress represents the American people, and if they see fit they can change the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Congress is not the people's master. It represents the people's will. Let me read a letter from the Department of Agriculture on this question that the Senator has broached as to how they deal with these men. This letter is addressed to me:

> Your letter of December 8, requesting to be advised of the status of the homestead entry of C. L. White, is received.
> From an examination of the records in this office it appears that Mr. White settled on the land in question before its inclusion within the boundaries of a national forest, but because of the fact of its being unsurveyed was unable to file upon it under the general homestead laws. He afterwards applied for the listing of this tract under the act of June 11, 1906 (forest homestead act), and was informed, after an examination of the land had been made, that approximately 30 acres of it would be listed with the Secretary of the Interior if he so desired, but that the remainder of the area contained a heavy stand of timber and was more valuable therefor than for agriculture.
> His settlement before the forest withdrawal gave him the right to enter the full 160 acres under the homestead law, provided bona fide residence and cultivation had been maintained, within 90 days after the filing of the plat of survey in the local land office. The records in the General Land Office show that sec. 4, T. 8 N., R. 8 E., B. M. (the description given in your letter), has been surveyed, and that the plat of survey was filed in the Boise land office on May 27, 1910, but they fail to show that Mr. White has ever made homestead entry of said tract. It is possible that the Department of the Interior may be able to give you some further information concerning this matter.

I followed it up. This man has lived there for a lifetime. He naturally selected land which was partially covered with timber. No sane man will go out and select prairie land unless he knows where he is going to get his timber. This man was not a squatter who went there with the intention of selling the timber. He wanted the timber, and was entitled to it.

When the homestead law became effective, it was such lands as these that became the basis of settlement. The man who went out on the prairie looked forward to secure timber rights near by or adjacent.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I received a letter this morning on this subject which is a fair sample of the injustice done to many settlers, and I should like a few moments in which to read a part of the letter.

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh——

Mr. ASHURST. It will not take more than a moment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would the Senator mind deferring that?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arizona for that purpose?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield, but I prefer that matters of that kind should be presented in a Senator's own time.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am daily receiving a great number of letters from citizens of Arizona, complaining of the arbitrary and unjust treatment they allege is dealt out to them by the forestry officials. I will select only one concrete case for illustration: Some 30 years ago one William Fourr, a man who had helped to fight the Apache Indians in the early days, helped to build up civilization and make Arizona the fair land she is to-day, settled upon 150 acres of nontimbered land in Cochise County, Ariz. He has been in the actual possession of this land over 29 years, has built thereon a three-room house, dug a well, built a windmill and water tank and set out fruit trees, and by his labor and sacrifices made it a fit habitation for himself. He is one of the sturdy pioneers, and these pioneer men and women are the people who qualified Arizona for statehood. The forest-reserve officials recently became active against Mr. Fourr, and he was indicted in the Federal court, charged with some unlawful act, in the way of some infraction of the forestry laws, but was promptly acquitted by a jury of his peers. Now the forestry officials have caused a civil suit to be brought against him, and they show every disposition to force him from this land. I am advised that these forestry officials are using every means to get possession of his improvements, and especially the water, in order, possibly, that the forestry officials may use it for a ranger station. If the forestry officials desired to administer the law with due regard to the rights of Mr. Fourr, they would release this land to the State of Arizona, as it is a part of section 32, which has been granted to the State as part of her school lands under the enabling act. But the narrow and unjust policy of the forestry officials seems to be to try to exclude, impoverish, and ruin Mr. Fourr. I thank the Senator from Idaho for this moment which he has granted to me.

Mr. HEYBURN. Here is a letter from a settler in Idaho. I sent him a communication of the Secretary in regard to his homestead, in reply to an inquiry as to its status. He addressed me under date of March 26, 1912, and says:

> That letter you got from the Secretary of Agriculture is not true. He said in the letter that where the timber stands there is soil thick with granite and coarse sand. There is no granite or sand there. It is good soil, which will not wash, and I can raise two crops of alfalfa on it. It is a funny thing that the Forestry Department can not state the truth about this land. This man Hoyt, from Ogden, who was out here last fall examining the ground, made such a complaint against this land that he could not look a man in the face. I did not see Mr. Hoyt. I was away, getting my lumber. I just wish I did see him. I would probably not have gotten in the hole I did getting my lumber and grub for the winter. I was going right ahead with my rail splitting and it was a good time to get them around the land before the snow came, when a letter from the forestry service of Ogden stated that my application must be rejected. This is a nice way to do a poor settler who is thinking of making a home for himself. I know what the Forestry Service is for—it is to hold out the settlers as much as they can.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 18642) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in order that the consideration of the Agriculture appropriation bill may go on, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, on the request of the Senator from North Carolina, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside. The Senator from Idaho will proceed.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not desire to encumber the RECORD with long letters. We have larger questions; that is, questions that reach further into the rights of the people individually and collectively than the individual complaints that come from settlers.

There are certain axioms or rules that I will state now, and then because of my fatigue and condition of health I will yield to my colleague to discuss this question in his own way. Should I feel equal to the occasion later, I will ask the further indulgence of the Senate. There are certain basic principles of government not to be overlooked. The Government belongs to the people and not to the officeholders whom they select. It is not to be exploited by these officeholders for their personal gain or glory. The continuation of a department in the Government or of a bureau, or of any other section of the Government, when it is not useful to the people but only to those who hold offices within the bureau or department, should be abolished. I am going to point that with an amendment that I propose to offer before this question is laid aside.

I spoke yesterday about the principle of government by commission. It has a wide application in the consideration of this question. I will not at this time resume its consideration, but in further response to the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], when he asks why this condition exists, I will tell him, in part, in addition to what I have said: There were a lot of young men blessed with more than the ordinary share of wealth and what they call social position who arrived on the scene about the time when the old landmarks of safe and conservative government were being attacked, and they were looking for something that they could take hold of so that somebody might know that they existed. They looked around soon after they arrived on the scene with a critical and envious eye. There was one archleader of these. I do not know whether he is leading now or not. He is in the midst of some kind of an affray. He says, "Who dared to undertake to arrange the universe before my arrival? What does their experience before my arrival amount to? Why should I admit that the things they have done are entitled to any consideration at my hands? It is true that that which I find is based upon the experience of men running through many generations of lives, but why can not I sit in judgment upon them at the very beginning of my experience and reform them?" Does that kind of language sound familiar to you? I was here when it started, and I was astonished to see master men, who had participated in the making of laws and the conduct of government for a lifetime, stung by the proposition. It was so new and so outrageous that they did not gather themselves in time to strike it and name it, as it was, impudence and sophistry.

They talk about the people. The only people for whom they had any consideration was themselves and those whom they intended to gather around them in seizing the inheritance of the American people as a whole. I read one of the speeches in the paper yesterday, I guess, in which it is proclaimed that the liberty of the people is at stake, and that unless some self-constituted savior reaches out his hand the people's liberties will leave them. I wonder if they know what liberty means! I wonder if they know the difference between liberty and license! The American people had to gain freedom before they could claim liberty, and it is only the free man who has liberty. Are the people of the West less entitled to that high standard of liberty which comes to them because they are free than are the people of the East? We have no masters in the West more than you have them in the East. We are not your masters nor are you ours in the question of exercising property rights in connection with the public property that belongs to all the people.

I have been reminded often on this floor that these lands belong as much to the East as to the West. Then come and get them. Come or send your sons or representatives in those fields of opportunity to share the hardships which belong to the pioneer and the blessings which come from the prosperity and growth of settlement and civilization. Let them come there and share in the payment of taxes, share in the performance of public duty, of the honors that come to men because of the performance of their duty; and then, when you do that, when a man can stand up here and say, "I am interested in that western country because my boy or some one in whom I am interested is there," then he is entitled to be heard. But if he were to stand up and say, "I am going to take away from that young man the natural rights and the enjoyment of the natural rights that belong to that country," then he would turn with shame from the consideration of men.

We are not foreigners. We went there from the same civilization that surrounded the best American citizenship. We went there because it was our inheritance, because it was a new land of opportunity, legitimate opportunity, the opportunity to participate in the making of States, in the widening of the scope and the power and the glory of our Nation. We have stood ready at all times to contribute to the general family of the American people in time of peace or in time of war. In the late War with Spain Idaho sent its regiments to the front. They shared in all the hardships and the glory of battle.

Remember you are not dealing with strangers. Why should you reach out this hand and spoil the vines of Idaho? Turn these lands back. I intend to introduced an amendment to this bill at the proper time turning these lands back into the public domain. Then, as suggested by the Senator from Nevada, we will see whether the laws fit the new conditions that will have arisen by reason of the long darkness that has enveloped us. Some of them will. The law that permits the man who has never yet exercised the right to take a homestead will be applicable. They have attempted to scare the people away from these lands by the false statement that all the good lands were taken. They have attempted to scare the people away from these lands by picturing all sorts of impossibilities. It was such conditions as are termed impossibilities that nerved the arm of the pioneer and made him reach that land, and these carpers and critics along the distant shores across the continent from that country never reached there, many because they had no need to look for larger fields of enterprise and others because they were not possessed by nature with that energy and willingness to sacrifice the comforts of life necessary to go to that frontier.

Suppose when this country was being settled along the Atlantic coast forest reserves had been created for the purpose of preserving the timber. Why, this country would have been a wilderness. Trees grow. The cutting down of a tree is not a fatal thing, although I would punish a man who would wantonly destroy a tree. I used to be termed by those who thought slightly about it a timber crank, because I opposed the cutting of trees except for useful purposes. How many men now go out and cut down a tree for the mere purpose of wasting it? Have you known of men who did it? Did you ever know of any person to destroy a tree wantonly? He had a use for it or thought he had, and he was entitled to judge of that. All this talk about the waste of forests is the chatter of men whose selfishness controls their tongue. Perhaps one man more careful than others might gain from a given tree more feet of lumber, but the great average of mankind's skill and judgment applies there as elsewhere. You might imagine that those of us in the West were stealing out in the darkness of the night to cut down the Government's trees. We are not so fond of exercise. We cut them to build fences around the land that our stock may be protected, to build the barns and the cabins, and afterwards the houses in which we live.

We can not live a community life in a forest reserve, even though the oft-repeated story is made applicable that the land may be entered if it is a forest reserve. No man is going to isolate himself by settling in any part of the country where he can not look forward to neighborhood life and neighborhood advantages, where he can not look forward to enhanced value for his lands and what his lands produce, because the whole country is growing up. No country was ever based upon a single settlement. You have got to have community life.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OLIVER in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question, growing out of not much knowledge of the situation. I should like to have his opinion upon the question as to whether it would not be a good thing for the United States to surrender all the public lands to the States in which the lands are situated and abolish the land offices.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think it would, and it probably——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the Senator from Idaho another question: Does he not think that common sense and scientific information with regard to the question of forest conservation existing upon a restricted territorial scale, in the State of Idaho or in any other State, could be just as fully trusted as the equally scientific information around the bureaus in the city of Washington?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, to conserve a portion of the land?

Mr. WILLIAMS. To decide how much to conserve, how to conserve it, what to conserve, and what to let go. As an example, are not the people of the State of Idaho just as good judges of their interests with regard to the conservation of natural resources, especially the conservation of forests, as the people of all the United States can have for them?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; Mr. President, we thought that the people of Idaho were as competent until we came down here and we found that we were not given the credit for intelligence and integrity of purpose that we had expected. But one thing we did do; perhaps the Senator's attention has not been called to it. Away back in 1904 we secured the action of this body and of both Houses of Congress that stayed the hand in Idaho, and there has been no forest reserve created there since the passage of that act.

We are the only State in the Union, so far as I know, in which that exception is made. At that time there had been created in Idaho 18,315,000 acres of forest reserves. That is about a fourth of the State. We secured the passage of a resolution here that prevented the creation of any more forest reserves in Idaho. We have had to stand here like pickets on duty ever since to prevent that being slipped out between some two phrases in an appropriation bill; but we have preserved it.

I should like to say to the Senator that a picture sometimes tells more than many words. The dark part of this map [exhibiting] is the withdrawn land in Idaho. It must be obvious that any act which would withdraw so large a proportion of the land in a State as is shown upon this map is open to suspicion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know about that. That depends upon the topography of the country, the climate, and other things.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me say to the Senator——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait a minute. I do not think it is a question of percentages at all. Let me state the point I was trying to gain information upon. I am not trying to give any upon this particular question, because I have none to give. If I had it, of course I would be glad to shed my light all around here. But what I wanted to know is this: Suppose the entire public-land question in the State of Idaho were surrendered to the State of Idaho, suppose it was left to the people of the State of Idaho to determine as to what ought to be put in forest reserves and what ought not to be, and to determine with regard to that part of the land which ought to be put in forest reserves, what rules and regulations ought to be adopted in order to conserve the potentialities of the reserved districts?

Mr. HEYBURN. It should be opened to settlement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is not the Senator of the opinion that the people of Idaho could control that situation?

Mr. HEYBURN. There is not the slightest doubt of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just as well as the people of the entire United States?

Mr. HEYBURN. They are closer to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And especially when the Senator from Idaho remembers that there are a good many people in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, like myself, for example, who have totally different climate problems to contend with and who have not got time to contend with this.

Mr. HEYBURN. I answer the Senator's question by saying that I have not the slightest doubt that the State of Idaho would control that more closely within the limits of wisdom than Congress could, because they are closer to it. They look out upon it. Every representative who goes up to the legislature from the different parts of the State is familiar with the conditions. The climate of Idaho is like that of other countries; it varies with the elevation. We have there all the way from 240 feet above sea level to ten and eleven thousand feet, and of course there is every variety of climate. The Senator spoke of it—at least I so understood him—as not having importance as an agricultural State. We will produce 18,000,000 bushels of wheat this year.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I never said one word about that.

Mr. HEYBURN. I must have misunderstood the Senator. I did not charge the Senator with having made invidious remarks at all. I only took the opportunity to show that we do things in Idaho. The county in which I live——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, there is this difference. Idaho possesses a large area of semiarid land. The State of Mississippi, for example, is nearly altogether a land where it rains too much.

Mr. HEYBURN. Semifluid.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; semifluid. What I was striking at is this: In my intellectual humility I do not think that I am a very fair judge of a condition of things totally varying from the condition to which I am accustomed, and, as far as I am concerned personally, I would rather not be put upon a jury to decide upon a question like this, concerning which I am totally ignorant and concerning which I have not time to make myself well informed, because I have a whole lot of things to look to that concern the condition of my people.

The point I was trying to reach was to inquire of the Senator whether he does not think it would be very well for the United States Government now at this point to quit the public-land business and to surrender the public land in the States to the respective States, with, perhaps, some condition as to a percentage from their sales to be put into the National Treasury, it being an inheritance of all of them, and leaving the control of the public lands within the respective States to the respective States, each to judge what is best to be done according to the conditions there existing, which probably exist nowhere else.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to answer that question. I would say to the Senator from Mississippi that I would gladly welcome legislation which would turn the public lands of the Government over to the State for administration. As to the manner or extent of contribution to the Public Treasury that would be a matter of detail which could be readily adjusted. I have the pleasure of knowing quite a number of citizens of Idaho who came from the Senator's State and have made their homes with us. In fact, some very distinguished men in our State were born in the State of Mississippi. They have been with us for years and have distinguished themselves as progressive, good citizens. They are interested in the protection of the rights of the citizens of the States. As I said before, there is not a Senator on this floor who has not some person in our State connected in interest or acquaintance with him.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that if the States undertook to take half of the timber areas within their borders the expense would be prohibitive, and we would be called upon here in Congress to assist in the protection, just as the States bordering on the Mississippi River now are calling upon us to contribute to protect the citizens against the ravages of the flood. As a matter of fact, the States could not administer this any more than the State of Mississippi could afford to build levees to protect it against overflow.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, we do all now that constitutes the administration of the law in those wildernesses called forest reserves. I am advised through an officer of one county in my State that they expended $14,000 in one year in maintaining the criminal court and prosecuting people who would take advantage of the forest reserve to make it their headquarters. Counterfeiters and that class of people take advantage of these solitudes to retreat from the observation of the public while they violate the law, and we pay the expenses.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I might say, further, that in States where these reservations are private holders of timber lands are cooperating with the United States and cooperating with the States and contributing money in addition to the large appropriations which are made by Congress. I think it is true probably in the Senator's State, as it is in my own, that the private owners of timber are petitioning us, just as the States are petitioning and memorializing us, to continue these appropriations in order to assist them to protect the forests of the State.

Mr. HEYBURN. Just as the owners of houses protect their houses and the owners of barns and haystacks protect them, the timber men in our State have in employment men to act as guardians against fires. The Senator never was more mistaken in his life, if he ever was mistaken before, than in saying the States would either be embarrassed or unable to administer these lands.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They might administer it, Mr. President; but even with the assistance of the Government of the United States and with the assistance of the individual timber owners, they were not able to protect the forests against the fires of 1910 and the fires of 1911. The purpose of these appropriations largely is to protect the forest against destruction by fire.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask the Senator from Nevada to pardon me a moment. I will then yield to him.

That is another as gross a fraud upon the public mind, through sensational publications, as was ever perpetrated. I saw those fires.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. So did I.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was there; I walked around that country with my heart sad because of the destruction that was going on.

I went back there the next summer, and the great, good God Almighty had thrown a green mantle over those mountain sides that made one forget the dread, the smoke, and the dismay of the night of the fire.

But let us look at this question fairly. The stories of these fires are exaggerated. There was no fire started in any settlement in Idaho during that period. I made it my business to investigate the matter very closely.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will ask the Senator——

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to make a concise statement, and then I will yield. I do not want my statement to be broken up.

The fires originated under the guardianship of the fire fighters. The poor fellows who were burned were the volunteers who went out from the towns and neighboring country to assist through a patriotic motive. But the fires that burned that country started within the exclusive jurisdiction of the fire fighters. I will not make any personal charge against those men, but they are as useless on an occasion of that kind as is a jay bird in a tree. The heroism of their actions consisted in trying to get away from the fire, and poor fellows were burned up—a lot of them—and I followed some of them to their graves, and my heart was saddened to think of a system that would result in such conditions.

In the early days before we had these people I was there; I have been a great many years in that country; and when a fire would start the people who lived in its vicinity would put it out. I participated, as did every other citizen who was able to do so, in putting out those fires; but now they are prohibited from even being on the forest reserve where they could be of some use. Not only did the fires not start in the settlements, but they started away back from the settlements and came sweeping up and burned and destroyed the settlers' homes. I know one settlement, right over the mountain from where I lived, where they had orchards growing ready to bear fruit, and their houses and barns built and their homes made. They thought they had reached a position where they could commence to live easy. These fires came sweeping over and burned them all up. Some of them who had not made final proof on their homesteads have never yet been able to make it, for they can not make the necessary affidavits now because the conditions do not exist.

There are other questions than those of detail that ought to control the governing principles, and I regret to be led off into the discussion of these minor details because they are not controlling, but only persuasive; but the great principles that I attempted to discuss and announced early in the consideration of this question are those that should govern. They are in this question. It is a question of right. Our rights are not less than those of the people of another section of the country. Suppose you have a right to participate in them; why do you not do it? Is the country to lie stagnant and in wilderness because the people of the East have a right to occupy it and do not exercise the right?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to say a few words in reply to a query of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]?

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator is only going to reply to the Senator from Mississippi, while I do not want to decline to yield, I would suggest that the Senator might do it at a later period; but still I have about reached the limit of my strength, and I am going to ask my colleague [Mr. BORAH] to take up the question, and then he can yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I simply wish to reply to a query. I do not propose to make a speech.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will yield, with the statement that perhaps later as some matters may occur to my mind, I shall take them up.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I simply wish to answer the query of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and not to speak at length. I have to say, in answer to the Senator, that I have no doubt the time will come when the entire public domain will be transferred to the States within which that domain rests. There is no reason why the State of Idaho should not ultimately own all that is left of the public domain within its boundaries; but the question is, when shall that transfer be made? I repudiate altogether the idea that the public domain in Idaho should be held by the National Government for the profit of the Nation.

I regard the Nation simply as the trustee for the benefit of the present and future residents of the State of Idaho, but I do believe that that trust requires the United States to protect these forests against fires, and to protect both the forest and the coal reserves against monopolistic control, and that in making the transfer of the public domain within Idaho to the State of Idaho the Government should wait until it is convinced that Idaho can adequately take care of that domain and shall turn it over under such restrictions as will prevent that large domain from falling under monopolistic control.

It is true that Idaho is an exceedingly well-governed State and that it has handled the lands which have hitherto been granted by the Nation to the State with a great deal of providence and care, but such providence has not characterized all the States, and it certainly has not characterized the weak States. Weak States, in the early days of their history, are often subject to control that results in these natural resources being turned over in large areas to single individuals, and it is the highest duty of the Nation, as trustee, to see that a premature grant is not made to the States and that conditions are imposed upon that grant which will prevent monopolistic control.

Take the State of Mississippi. The junior Senator from that State is not here; I wish he were, for I should like to ask him whether he does not regard the grant of the swamp lands to the State of Mississsippi as having been improvidently made by the National Government. Those lands have drifted into private ownership, and the owners have been unable to adequately protect them against floods, the cooperative effort of the State and of the owners has not been sufficient to protect them, and to-day they are calling upon the Nation, which originally owned those swamp lands, to aid the State and aid the owners of those properties in a cooperative effort to protect them from floods in order that they may redeem the promise of fruitfulness which they have always given. It would have been a great deal better in every one of the States had the swamp lands been retained by the General Government until some full and comprehensive plan had been developed for their reclamation. Then, that reclamation being accomplished under one sovereignty and one control, under the power of the Nation, not only as owner, but under the power of the Nation as sovereign over commerce and navigation as a part of that commerce; it would have been a great deal better had the National Government held title until the lands were fully reclaimed, and had then, by some just system of entry under the public-land laws, transferred the title to individual owners. Thus they would gradually be subjected to the taxing power of the State.

This very question is likely to arise with reference to forests. We have this deadlock simply because the Nation took alarm and found that our forests were gradually drifting under monopolistic control.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] has within the last half hour alluded to the fact that through faults either of legislation or of administration large areas of these forest lands have drifted into individual control, and that monopolists are now cooperating with the Forestry Service to make monopoly more effective by keeping the public forests out of competition with private owners. He thus practically admits that either under legislation or maladministration the forests drifted out of the ownership of the people, not in segregated parts, which would be generally beneficial, but in large areas, and subject to monopolistic control.

So it is with reference to coal deposits. Those lands have been withdrawn simply because there were evasions and frauds under existing law, and large areas, against the spirit and purpose of the law, were drifting into the hands of great corporations. The result is that between these two contending forces—the people, on the one hand, who wish the old laws to remain in order that they may be evaded, as they have been in the past, and the people on the other side, who wish those lands withdrawn until proper legislation can be passed—we have this deadlock, resulting in a partial paralysis of the West. It seems to me that the only sensible thing to do is to break this deadlock through wise legislation. I asked the Senator from Idaho whether he would suggest the laws which could be passed which would break this deadlock and open up the public domain to the proper development of its resources. There is no one more competent to frame such a code than is the Senator from Idaho, and yet he had made no suggestion. I think if the Senator from Idaho would apply a portion of the great ability and the knowledge which he possesses to the framing of a code of laws, with the purpose of breaking this deadlock, he would have little difficulty in bringing his associates from that region to his view. I know the Senator from Idaho is overburdened with legislation and with legislative work; there is no man who shirks his duty less than the Senator from Idaho; and he will pardon me if I say I think that in some degree this is a case of misdirected energy, and that a part of the energy which is applied to denunciation of the national services in their effort under the law to protect the public domain, if applied to legislation which would break this deadlock, would be of vastly more benefit to the region which we represent.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not rise to criticize or to oppose the appropriation provided for in this bill for taking care of our forest fires. So long as we have the forests in the condition in which we now have them and are likely to have them for some time, it is undoubtedly our prime duty to take care of them, even if the expense seems to be very heavy. I desire also to say that, while my remarks may seem to be finding fault with individuals in the service, I would prefer it be understood that I am not charging personal incompetency or dishonesty. I am criticizing a system of administration for which Congress and the departments are alike responsible, with the hope that through discussion we may arrive at a better method of applying the sound principles of conservation in which I claim to be a believer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I entirely agree with the opening sentence of the remarks being made by the Senator from Idaho, yet he must pardon me for saying that a good many of us do want some information upon this subject outside of the present condition. A good many of us are not willing to be bound by the fact that the present condition exists and by the assumption that nothing else could take its place. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho in that connection, if he can give me the information, to tell me how the management of the semiarid lands and the forests generally in Texas, where all the public lands were reserved to the State and where the United States has never had any public lands, compares with the management of the same questions in other States, where the United States has title to the land.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, my remarks will be largely what might be considered an answer to the question asked by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. While I myself should be very glad to see some change, my opening remark was to the effect that, so long as the change is not had, we will have to take care of the forests, and I am not, therefore, opposing this appropriation; neither do I rise, Mr. President, to criticize or to discuss in a general way the general principles of conservation. That subject has been discussed so ably and conclusively by my colleague [Mr. HEYBURN] that I do not propose either to express approval or disagreement with the different features of it, further than what may be involved in a discussion of some of the details of its administration.

We have this conservation policy, and, however much we may desire to change and modify it, neither will be done except as a result of considerable education, because the theory of conservation is a very attractive one. It has a tendency, apparently, to exhilerate mentally those who entertain these ideas, and our eastern friends, who do not come in contact with its actual administration, only see the one side, and that is the attractive side.

Every right-thinking person believes, I presume, in withholding the great natural resources, in so far as it is practicable to do so, from the grasp of those who would gather them up for monopolistic purposes. We of the West believe in retaining our natural resources until such time as they can be transmitted, to be enjoyed individually by the citizens rather than collectively by some monopolistic power. But, Mr. President, the controlling and practical question now is, How can these natural resources be made available and serviceable to the people? Our forests, our power sites, our coal, and most of our public lands are withdrawn, and now the question is, How shall we make these resources available to the people? If they simply remain withdrawn they will serve no one.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho if he does not think the State of Idaho could be as safely trusted to keep these lands out of the grasp of private monopoly and greedy people generally as could the United States?

Mr. BORAH. As I said a moment ago, I am going to discuss that question presently, but I will answer it by a single sentence and say that, in my judgment, it is not only more capable, but when you compare the history of the State of Idaho with reference to its dealing with its public resources, with the history of the United States with reference to its dealing with natural resources, the action of the State of Idaho is far better for the people than that of the United States. Neither has been without fault naturally, but I have no doubt the people of my State have exercised better judgment and have been more regardful of the true interests of the people than the Federal Government within our State.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I understood. Furthermore, if the Senator will pardon me for a moment, I understand that the State of Texas, which has from the beginning reserved her public lands and in which the United States have never held any public lands, has managed to solve her problems about as well as the United States have solved their problems.

Mr. BORAH. The only monopoly of natural resources in Idaho has come from the possibility of creating such monopoly under Federal statutes and Federal laws, and the only successful effort to limit or control that monopolistic power comes from the laws passed by the State of Idaho. That is true with reference to every natural resource I know of within the State. If anyone desires to go further into that discussion or challenges that proposition, there are plenty of facts to sustain my statement. The fundamental principles of conservation, the fundamental principles which have to do with the retaining of natural resources to the people were found embodied in the constitution and the statutes of our State before this propaganda began as a national movement.

The western settler, with that capacity which he has to apply his wisdom in a practical way to the conditions which are about him, early embedded into the statutes of the States of the West and into their constitutions those principles upon which we are relying to-day to protect the people from the grasp and the power which would control for monopolistic purposes.

There are a few matters with reference to the administration of the conservation principles which I now desire to discuss. In the first place, I presume everyone will agree that the agricultural lands which are found within the forest reserves ought to be opened to entry. There is sufficient land in the United States for the growing of timber and unfit for anything else to make it unnecessary to undertake to make trees grow where under the laws of nature they have never grown heretofore. There is a vast amount of land within the forest reserves which is just as good agricultural land as that without the forest reserves, and those who ask that that land be put outside of the forest reserves, subjected to entry, and opened to the building of homes are not rightfully subject to the charge of being opposed to conservation. True conservation consists in reducing national resources to the practical benefit of the individual who comes within the State to help build up the Commonwealth. Vast tracts of these arid lands are utterly useless unless man expends his energy and his efforts to reclaim them. The true conservation policy would be not to hold that land within the forest reserves, where it grows neither timber nor anything else, but to throw it open to entry so that the homesteader may go there and build his home, render it subject to taxation, make it a part of the supporting power of the Government and a home for citizens of the State. The mere tying up of the land or the locking up of resources can not in any sense be conservation; and that is a lesson that some of our friends must learn before they can make conservation a reality. First of all, therefore, let us get these lands which are agricultural eliminated from the reserves. This will not hurt the reserves but help them, besides serving greatly the State in which the reserves are situated.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire only a moment. My understanding of the workings of the Forest Service and the theory of conservation is that the forest reserves are supposed to include lands that are unfit for agricultural purposes; that the purpose is to bring within the reservations only those lands that can not be utilized for any other purpose; and, although they may be barren now, the business of conservation is to ascertain what kind of trees they will produce, and go about the work of producing those trees on those otherwise barren and useless lands.

Mr. BORAH. Would the Senator from Florida like to have the Government of the United States purchase the agricultural lands of Florida, inclose them in a forest reserve, and drive the home builders away from them?

Mr. FLETCHER. Not at all; but, as I have said, the idea, as I understand, is only to include in forest reservations those lands which are unfit for agricultural purposes, lands which would never be settled and occupied by people who wanted to engage in the growing of crops or horticulture or agriculture.

That is the theory and, I think, the practice, so far as the two forest reserves in Florida are concerned.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I imagine it is a supposition that that is true. I think that is the supposition under which our friends are laboring throughout the East who have not seen the real situation. One reason why it is very difficult to engage the attention of those who are not familiar with the circumstances in this discussion is because they assume that that which has been supposed to be true is true. We want you to know the real facts, and my object is to bring these facts before you. I would not discuss this matter merely to apparently criticize some one. I would like to present things as we know them to be.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not a fact that during recent years there have been corrections going on and surveys made, and that several million acres a year are being taken out of the forest reserves and restored to settlement?

Mr. BORAH. It is true that within the last two or three years that has been going on, but I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact it has been the persistent and constant agitation upon the part of western Senators which has brought it about. When we opened the discussion in this Chamber several years ago—and the discussion is going to last—we were met with the assertion that there were no agricultural lands within the forest reserves, and notwithstanding that fact thousands of acres have been opened and are now as fine ranches as you can find in our western country.

Mr. FALL rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me finish this, please.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly. Then I will yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If it is true that several millions acres a year are now being restored to the public domain for settlement, would not the Senator from Idaho say that that is a sufficient recognition and is a sufficient adjustment of the difficulty?

Mr. BORAH. Not a sufficient one, although, praise the Lord, they are going in the right direction.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So it seems to me we are on the safe side at least if these forest reserves have been marked out and gradually, as rapidly as the matter can be carefully and justly done, those lands which are not fit for forest reservation are being restored to the public domain for settlement.

Mr. BORAH. But if it had not been for the discussion here—and it will be continued until the purpose is accomplished—there would not have been an acre restored to the public domain.

Now, I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. In answer to the question propounded by the Senator from Nebraska, I ask, Is it not a fact that nine-tenths or ninety-nine one-hundredths of the eliminations from forests have not been of agricultural lands? At least I can say that is true in the Southwest—that they have eliminated none of the agricultural lands from forest reserves, although they have eliminated a million acres in the last two or three years from the total of about 11,000,000 acres in forest reserves.

Mr. BORAH. They have eliminated some agricultural lands in our State. There is a vast amount which we have been trying to have eliminated, although not yet successful. It is difficult at any time to move this vast machinery so as to get any relief.

I know precisely how they feel about it. They look upon this as a great estate which belongs to them, and they move with great reluctance when that estate is to be diminished in any way. They argue that whenever a piece of land is eliminated from a forest reserve—as the report shows; and I am quoting almost the exact words of the report—and passes into individual ownership, that it passes from the people forever. The fact is when it passes to individual ownership it passes to the people forever. But the defect of administration of this feature of the law I will discuss in a few moments, and may present some data with reference to it.

Taking up the question of the disposition of the timber in these forest reserves, suppose we should continue for the next thousand years the policy that has been pursued for the last ten. Will some man who is wise upon this subject and has the theory of this subject down to a successful issue tell me what advantage the masses would derive from the proposition? If we were to continue to let stand these vast tracts of timber in the forest reserves, where the timber falls and rots or is periodically burned, and sell it to the masses of the people of the United States at a price in excess of that sold by the timber companies themselves, then what benefit would the people of the United States derive?

From information furnished me by the Forestry Bureau I learn that the average price of timber sold has advanced from $1.98 per thousand board feet in 1909 to $2.56 in 1911, and that this timber is sold, as I understand, absolutely upon the proposition of securing the greatest amount of revenue. It also appears that the rates of the forestry sales are higher than the prevailing prices of privately owned timber of the same quality and at the same distance from the market. If it be true that this timber is to be sold at a higher price than private individuals sell timber, and this is to continue, it is evident that the proposition is to become a revenue-making proposition, and that the people will be able to buy cheaper of the timber companies than they will of their own Government. It seems to me that the Government is going to be in a position pretty soon where it will owe an apology to the timber companies for having accused them of selling at trust prices. I do not think that the department, however, or the bureau is wholly to blame. Congress ought to declare a policy upon the subject.

We are asking for a practical administration of a great principle. We do not complain of the proposition on its principles, but we ask that they take it from the skies and plant it among those engaged in an actual struggle for existence, and until that is done it will be of very little benefit to the people, no matter how much pleasure it may give to those who indulge in theory. Let us make it sufficiently practical that the people at large get some advantage.

Two years ago the forest fires swept over vast tracts of country in the West, and left a lot of land burned over, as will be seen from the statement found in the report of the Secretary of Agriculture for 1911.

The fires of the calendar year 1910 covered more than 3,000,000 acres of Government timberland and 800,000 acres of private timberland within the national forest boundaries, and inflicted damages to national forest timber, including young growth, estimated at a little less than $25,000,000. The loss in timber destroyed or damaged was slightly over 6,500,000,000 board feet. In a single season the losses exceeded the total of all former years since Government protection of the forests began. Compared with the calendar year 1909, the estimated money loss in 1910 was in the ratio of more than 50 to 1. In fighting the fires special expenditures were incurred totaling over $1,000,000, besides the cost in time of the regular protective force.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am somewhat startled at the suggestion that $25,000,000 of timber was destroyed. Does the Senator think that possible? Does he not think that somebody must have imposed upon the Secretary of Agriculture when he published that statement?

Mr. BORAH. I shall not at this time enter upon a defense of the Secretary as to his being mislead.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thought perhaps the Senator had an opinion about it. It does seem startling that that amount of property could have been destroyed.

Mr. BORAH. Our eastern friends, when they listen to those coming from the West, men who have grown up with such experiences, find a great many facts of which they were uninformed when they were legislating against the West.

Mr. GALLINGER. The eastern men have never been legislating against the West.

Mr. BORAH. We never would have had these conditions if they had not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know who the Senator accuses.

Mr. BORAH. Not the Senator from New Hampshire singly, but the people who have imposed these conditions upon us without being familiar with the facts.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator certainly would not accuse me and my associates representing the New England States, because we have all stood by the West in every proposition it has presented for a long series of years.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I think that we here know that that is true. The Senator from New Hampshire has always been friendly to the West.

In relation to the loss of millions of dollars in the United States caused by forest fires, I will say, of course, it is an estimate, but when you have a forest fire covering a tract of country bigger than any one of the New England States except Maine, and possibly two or three times as large, it is hard to figure how many million dollars of property the fire may have destroyed. It is true that millions upon millions of dollars have been destroyed by fire, and the extent of the forests there is not comparable to the forests that the representatives of the eastern country are familiar with.

Mr. GALLINGER. We understand that.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not like to interrupt my colleague, but there is one fact I should like to state.

The burning of a forest is not always a loss. The great Coeur d'Alene mining country would not have been discovered but for the fact that it had been burned over a year or two before and was thus made available for prospecting. I know from what has occurred since that if existing conditions had existed at that time they could not have found the mines at all. The prospectors would not have gone where they were. The forest fires, as a rule, are flash fires. They follow up burned-over tracts.

As to the statement of a loss amounting to $25,000,000, I think a man might have reached into a pile of figures and picked out any other combination. He might have got some figures and put them together. Some timber was burned that some day probably would have been available, but the timber that was burned has not yet been missed in the commercial world.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have listened to this discussion now for two or three years. I have become convinced that something is wrong, but I should like to know just what it is that is wrong, and in just what respect the law ought to be amended in order to correct what is wrong.

I have not very much knowledge of the subject, but it seems to me there ought to be some way of preventing the occurrence of the things which are condemned here. I hope the Senator from Idaho before he finishes will give us a clear idea of how the law should be amended in order to bring about the state of affairs he thinks ought to exist. I for one shall be glad to vote for such a law and help him to correct the evils which he depicts so graphically.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Iowa to begin with that in the first instance there was something wrong; that is, in the creation of these forest reserves.

There is a map of the State of Idaho. That black portion [indicating] is withdrawn. There is almost one-third of our State that has been withdrawn from settlement or use, and in that vast area, larger than two or three of some Eastern States (you can take the great State of New York and put it down in one of those forest reserves and lose it), the timber is permitted to stand unused and unavailable. It falls and rots. The underbrush becomes heavy, and when fire strikes it you might just as well try to put down a fire in a powder mine.

These lands are not even pastured in the northern part of the State or used in any shape or form. It is absolutely impossible to protect that vast area from forest fires the way it is kept.

The figures of fires for 1910 compare as 50 to 1 with the fires previous to that time, for the reason that forest reserves are in a better condition to be burned after they have been corralled for five or six years, stopping their use by the country, and allowing the underbrush to become heavy.

Mr. CUMMINS. That brings up the very point in mind. I suppose some President withdrew those lands from entry and sale.

Mr. BORAH. That is correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suppose he did it under authority of law, although I do not know as to that.

Mr. BORAH. He assumed that he did.

Mr. CUMMINS. He assumed that he did. Does the Senator from Idaho want Congress to take away from the President of the United States the right to withdraw lands from entry and sale and embrace them in forest reservations, and if any forest reservations are to be preserved how ought we to define them and who must prescribe the limits for them?

Mr. BORAH. In the first place, what we want as a practical proposition and above all other things is to have taken out of that vast area all that portion of the land which is agricultural land and which ought to be open to settlement, where the settler would go and not only become a home builder and a payer of taxes, but in a large measure would be a protector of the forests. I undertake to say, notwithstanding the statements to the contrary in the report, that there are thousands and thousands of acres which would be settled up within the next five years if thrown open to entry, and such settlement would be one of the best means of protection we could possibly have for the rest of the reserve. We want these lands upon which no valuable timber stands or has ever stood, all agricultural lands, made available to settlement. We do not want that decided by some special agent wholly unfamiliar with lands passing upon each application, but we want all lands classified and then thrown open so the settler may go and acquire title under the general laws relative to acquiring homesteads.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that the withdrawal authority——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah will have to speak louder. He can not be heard at the desk.

Mr. SMOOT. A law was passed withdrawing from the President of the United States the authority to make any further additions to forest reserves in certain States.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that originally they must have been withdrawn through the authority of the President.

Mr. SMOOT. They were withdrawn by the President.

Mr. CUMMINS. The complaint, however, is that the withdrawal included a great deal of land that did not properly belong in a forest reserve.

Now, my question, which I propounded to the Senator from Idaho and will submit to the Senator from Utah as well, is, How are we to correct that mistake? Who are we to appoint to determine whether certain land ought to be in a forest reserve or ought not to be in a forest reserve? Palpably such land as the Senator from Idaho describes ought not to be in forest reserves. Let us do something about it. Let us create some sort of a body that will take such land out of forest reserves.

Mr. SMOOT. In answer to the Senator from Iowa I will state that the Forester, on April 11, 1912, addressed a letter to the Secretary of Agriculture in which he outlined a plan for the classification of all the lands within the forest reserves, and as soon as that classification is made I am told that all agricultural lands will be eliminated from the forest reserves and be open to entry the same as all other agricultural land in the United States.

Mr. BORAH. I do not reflect upon the good faith or the abundant hope which seems to possess my friend the Senator from Utah, nor do I challenge the good faith of the department, but that sounds to me like "hope deferred maketh the heart sick." We have been promised that for years, and we have had a law passed by Congress authorizing it to be done. It has not been carried out. We have had repeated statements to the effect that it would be.

I sincerely hope the Senator from Utah is correct. If he is, and this is carried out, the Forester will be entitled to our thanks and gratitude, and one question will be largely solved. I express this doubt, and at the same time must say I have been assured it will be done; and, of course, I have no right to challenge the good faith of the Forester.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say, and I know the Senator from Idaho will agree with me, that within the last three years there have been many hundreds of thousands and perhaps millions of acres eliminated from the forest reserves. I know this practice has been going on, not perhaps as rapidly as it should, but it has gone on just as fast as the department has had money with which to carry it out, so they tell me.

I should like to see every acre of land within the forest reserves that is suitable for a home or is suitable for agricultural purposes of any kind eliminated from the forest reserves.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Does the Senator believe that that elimination will be properly made when the elimination is left in charge of those whose every desire is to make the forest reserves as large as possible and to keep them from settlement?

Mr. SMOOT. I hardly think——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I want to call the Senator's attention to another thing. He says hundreds of thousands of acres have been eliminated. I think if the Senator will look over the administration of the land laws, both in regard to forest reservation and other things within the last few years, he will find a continual reaching out in an endeavor to put more and more acres in the reserves and take it away from useful occupation.

I call the Senator's attention to the fact that within the last 60 days we have done what has not yet been attemped before—that is, reserving water holes upon our deserts.

Mr. SMOOT. In answer to the first suggestion offered by the Senator from Wyoming, I will say that in times past there has been an inclination to add just as much land as possible to the forest reserves. That practice, I will admit, has in many instances been carried too far. But I do not believe the tendency to-day is to add to forest reserves, but rather the tendency is to eliminate the agricultural lands from those reserves, and I hope that it will increase.

As to the question of the withdrawal of water holes, as stated by the Senator, that has happened within the last month, I believe. I have not gone into it as carefully, perhaps, as I should have done, but in speaking with the Secretary of the Interior when he appeared before the Public Lands Committee—I think the Senator from Wyoming was there—the Secretary justified the withdrawal upon the ground that the water holes were taken up and script put over them by cattle men or sheep men, and that as soon as they obtained the right to the water they excluded all other cattle or sheep from coming anywhere near the water, thereby virtually controlling the great part of the country for grazing purposes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The difficulty was that the department found that some one wanted one of these water holes, and so they withdrew it.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I find that within the last three years in the State of New Mexico, for example, there have been eliminated from the Zuni Reserve 108,319 acres, and there were added 170,968 acres, making a total of 845,849 acres in that reserve, whereas as originally constituted it had a total acreage of 783,200.

I find that on the Pecos Reserve there have been eliminated 31,561 acres, and there have been added thereto 129,819 acres; that it now has 813,758 acres, whereas it started with 715,500 acres.

I find that in the Manzano Reservation there have been eliminated 84,158 acres, and there have been added thereto 278,670 acres. That reserve started with 600,500 acres, and it now has 795,012 acres.

I find that from the Datil Forest Reservation there have been eliminated 95,178 acres and there have been added thereto 183,091 acres. That was one of our largest forest reserves, originally containing 2,955,000 acres, and now 3,042,913.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Does he know whether any of the lands that have been added to any of the forest reserves within the last three years, or the period of which the Senator speaks, are agricultural lands?

Mr. FALL. I think the Senator from Utah possibly does not understand what I understand by the term "agricultural lands on forest reserves."

The law, as I understand it, with reference to so-called agricultural land on forest reserves provides that they may be entered under the homestead act under certain conditions, not that they are withdrawn or that the forest reserve is withdrawn from around those lands, but it simply segregates tracts of land of from 40 to 160 acres within a forest reserve of 3,000,000 acres, and they may be, under certain conditions, entered by homesteaders; but those conditions are so onerous to meet that in not one case out of a thousand will a man enter the land, or if he enters it, will he remain long enough to acquire title under the United States land laws.

Mr. SMOOT. Is there any question whether any of the lands added to the forest reserves in the last three years were agricultural lands?

Mr. FALL. I beg to answer that in this way: Timberlands in New Mexico are above the elevation of 6,000 feet. The lands below that do not grow timber for commercial purposes or for any other purpose except for firewood.

The lands below the elevation of 6,000 feet are the grazing lands. At the foot of the mountains, below the line at which the timber grows, there are springs from which our cattle and sheep, grazing upon the public domain or upon private land, may get water.

It appears to us that the object of the forest reserve has been to take in those water holes, to take in those living waters, and deprive the people of the opportunity of grazing their cattle upon the lands and their cattle of the use of the water, and thus to compel them to secure a permit to go across a quarter of a mile of the area of a forest reserve at the cost of from as high as 35 cents for every head of cattle to as low as 10 cents for sheep for the entire year to that patented water hole or to the springs.

For some years we have made it so interesting to those people who were holding us up, and that without law, that they have eliminated some portion of the land. They are grazing lands. I do not believe there is one foot of agricultural land in New Mexico which they have eliminated from a forest reserve. They hold to it. But they may have, in some instances, where some powerful cattle company was involved. They have, for every acre of land which has been eliminated, taken hundreds of acres of land from the use of the small cattle or sheep owner. The elimination has not been of agricultural lands, because the forest reserves, except up in the timber itself, are not in an agricultural country in the Southwest.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho continue to yield?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply wish to ask another question of the Senator from New Mexico. The Senator, then, says they are not agricultural lands, but they are grazing lands?

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, the Department of Agriculture has withdrawn grazing lands and added them to forest reserves?

Mr. FALL. Yes; and I think I am safe in saying that of the total area—10,295,000 acres—embraced in the forest reserves in the State of New Mexico at least one-third—and I believe one-half—are agricultural lands and not forest lands, and never will be forest lands.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, all I know is that foresters have told me that it was not the policy of the Forest Service to withdraw grazing lands and add them to forest reserves. As far as my own State is concerned, wherever there has been a protest at all they have always granted the wish of the protestant and never have added grazing lands to forest reserves in my State. I was quite surprised to learn of its being carried on in other States, because I know that they claim they are not being added to forest reserves to-day.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to say to the Senator that I do not rise for the purpose of taking up time in making a speech on forest reservations. I simply want to get some probably useful and interesting information as to the mode of operation to see if it is possible for us to arrive at a remedy. I understand that there is a Bureau of Conservation in the Agricultural Department.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose there must be.

Mr. McCUMBER. That bureau investigates the question of these reservations as well as the control of them, and upon the advice of that bureau the President eliminates the land from that which has already been withdrawn.

Mr. BORAH. Not in the State of Idaho. Otherwise that is true.

Mr. McCUMBER. Outside of the State of Idaho that is true. But as to whether the President may release anything in the State of Idaho, if one-third of that which is already in reserve is good agricultural land, will depend very much upon the information and advice that he receives from this bureau. Is not that correct?

Mr. BORAH. I think it is exclusive absolutely of any advice that comes from any other source.

Mr. McCUMBER. That bureau, then, being the governing power practically in these matters, is not the trouble with the personnel of the bureau which refuses to recommend that there be a restoration made where the evidence is clear that one-third of that which has already been taken is nothing but agricultural lands and fit for agriculture rather than for the propagation of trees?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to have this debate, so far as I am concerned, drift too much to personal criticism.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not ask that that be done. I simply want to know where the authority lies and why we can not get a proper operation of the law as it now exists. The law as it now exists, I think the Senator will agree with me, does not intend or purpose that we shall take 2,000,000 acres of mountainous land that has timber, wholly unfit for agricultural purposes, and then attach to that a million and a half acres of good agricultural land that has not a stick of timber on it. If there is this segregation of agricultural lands, why not the fault somewhere in the bureau rather than in the law itself?

Mr. BORAH. I think there is great fault in the bureau, but the fault in the bureau arises largely out of the fault of the system. The system is the result, in my judgment, of the misapprehension and misunderstanding of people who have never seen this conservation policy in operation. As I said awhile ago, the theoretical side of it is right, it is not to be challenged in a certain sense, and if applied in a practical way for the purpose of reducing these natural resources to the ownership and use and control of individual citizens, as originally evidently intended, it would be a desirable thing. But it has resolved itself in not only withholding them from the grasp of the monopolies, as they say, but in absolutely withholding them from the use of the individual citizen. So we are no better off out there, in one sense, in my judgment, than if the monopolies had hold of them. The monopolies would divide some part of the resources, while the Government gives us no part.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is it not also true it was said there was no danger of there being a monopoly in agricultural land, and notwithstanding that one-third of this tract that is segregated in the State of Idaho is fairly good agricultural land?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know just how much. There is a vast area. There is no question about it. I would not be able to say whether it is one-third, but it is a vast area.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator from Idaho will yield, I should like to ask him whether he does not think it a practical solution of the difficult question of grazing lands that has been worked out under the supervision of the Forestry Service? The Senator from New Mexico has stated that the lands held in various reservations are not agricultural lands, but are grazing lands.

Mr. BORAH. That is, in his State.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; and that is true in some other States, as I can show. The Senator from Idaho realizes that grazing lands can not very well be settled. They can not be entered as homesteads. It is not, therefore, a satisfactory and practical solution of the question for the Forestry Service to lease those grazing lands, as it is doing, to the cattle and sheep interests of the West. I notice by the report, which is on the desks of some Senators, that the revenue from the leasing of those lands by the Forestry Service has been gradually growing until it now approximates $1,000,000 a year. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho whether that is not a satisfactory and a practical solution of the difficult question of handling grazing lands, which has confronted Congress for a good while?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, no system and no proposition is satisfactory to the West which is going to lay upon us a tax and a burden for the use of our natural resources which is going to be put into the Treasury of the United States. Those natural resources belong to the people who come within the State of Idaho and these other States to utilize them, and we feel that our integrity and our patriotism are quite equal to taking care of that which is so essential to our happiness and our prosperity.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Idaho then holds that this grazing land should be turned over without any charge to the people of the West. Is that the Senator's position?

Mr. BORAH. It should be turned over to the States. The income from these natural resources belongs to people within the State or who come within the State to become citizens of the State. Why should our people be taxed as the people of Eastern States are not taxed? Why should we pay a rent or license to the National Government that you do not pay?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator hold that it should be turned over to the owners of the herds?

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the owners of the herds are to pay for the use of them, why should they not pay for the use of them to the people of the United States, who own them?

Mr. BORAH. The people of the United States hold this property in trust for the people who come within these great Commonwealths. It was never intended that they should have the heart carved out of them and be left with but the remnant of the carcass, but it was designed that from the resources within that State the manhood and the womanhood of the State should make a great Commonwealth. If you will turn your taxes or your revenue or your income from these natural resources into the State treasury to build up our eleemosynary institutions and schoolhouses and to take care of our institutions, we will find no fault.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand that the sum turned in now amounts to something like half a million dollars a year, which a few Western States are deriving in revenue. Is not that true?

Mr. BORAH. A part of it. We get only a part of it, when we are entitled to have the whole.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. FALL. Is it not a fact that we get less than 25 per cent of what we ourselves pay into the forest reserves? We, the people of the West, pay 100 cents and we get back, by the grace of Congress and the Agricultural Department, 25 cents.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield, and to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I think I should yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; let the Senator from Wyoming proceed.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has hit on the crux of the whole situation. The Senator from Nebraska believes that the land and the timber and the water and the mines and the grass of the West are to be exploited for the people of the whole country as a commercial proposition.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I can not permit the Senator from Wyoming to make a definition of my position on that point without a correction. I can hardly permit that to go. I called attention to the fact that a part of the proceeds derived from the leasing of this land and from the sale of the timber has been by Congress already diverted.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Is was the Senator's former statement that I referred to, when he asked the Senator from Idaho if it was his motion that these natural resources should be turned over to the State. That, as I said, is the vital point of the whole proposition. There is a body of theorists in this country, and a body of practical men as well, who believe, as I said, that all these national resources upon Government land is the property of the Government, to be utilized in a commercial way for the benefit of the Treasury of the United States. The proposition, on the other side, is that the timber and the grass and the minerals and the water are the property of the citizens of the United States when the citizen goes there to use them. That is the difference, and that is the difficulty in the whole proposition. The one would exploit for purposes of development, for purposes of production, for purposes of taxation, for purposes of immediate use all of these resources that are necessary. The other would hold them up and reserve them and conserve them as a business proposition for the benefit of the people of the whole country, wherever they may live, and until that difference can be settled we will have annually here this debate upon the floor of this Chamber.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is not the difference substantially in one sentence this: One side contends that the United States is only a beneficiary of these lands and of their resources and the other side contends that it is a trustee for the State development?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is exactly the difference.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rose to ask that question.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is exactly the difference.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Wyoming has answered it.

Mr. BORAH. I concur with the Senator from Wyoming and the Senator from Mississippi. Mr. President, I have wandered afield from what I was trying to say. I do not object, however, to this discussion or debate. I am glad to have it go on in this way.

To come back, we were discussing these lands which are in the forest reserves which we think are agricultural lands and which we think are entitled to pay taxes and out of which we are entitled to make homes. If we could get it settled, as the department could settle it now under the laws which we have, it would take away one of the aggravating conditions with reference to this matter.

I earnestly insist that the immigrant who starts from the Eastern States and Southern States or Central States and comes our way shall be permitted to stop there as long as the agricultural lands are there and not be forced to go into Canada and take the oath of allegiance to another form of government in order to get a piece of land. We all know, as a matter of fact—and the figures show it—that about 500,000 immigrants have gone into Canada in the last three or four years. Those men are of the best men we have in this country. They are men who are seeking homes; and very few bad men ever seek homes upon the public domain, because it costs too much to get it, too much labor to get it, to be characteristic of a bad man. They have gone into Canada when there are thousands of acres in my State and other places which they are entitled to settle upon on every theory of the correct building up of the State or the Republic.

Several years ago we passed a law permitting the Forestry Bureau of the Agricultural Department to classify these lands, and when agricultural lands they were to be thrown open to entry. Instead of classifying these lands and saying, here are 50,000 acres or 100,000 acres which we will eliminate from this reserve and you can enter them under the general homestead laws of the United States, the Forestry Bureau proceeds upon the plan of special applications. When a man wants to take 160 acres of that land they permit him to make an application and send out a special agent and have him look over that land.

Now, I say it in no disrespect to those special agents when I say that many of them are utterly unfit to judge of lands. They have had no experience in making farms. They have never ranched in their lives. They do not know of that yearning which a settler has for a home, and they have no possible conception of the sacrifice which he will make in order to get it nor of his capacity to make that which seems a desert a home. Millions of acres in the West to-day, as good homes as there are under the shining sun, would never have been settled if they had waited for the judgment of one of these parties who now pass upon such matters.

The result has been to this effect. I have a statement here showing that since the passage of the act of June 11, 1906, there have been 22,526 applications for agricultural lands upon these forest reserves. Out of the 22,526 applications 8,703 have been allowed. That of itself is sufficient to show the impractical working of that proposition. But every one of those settlers who was turned away, his application refused, the difference between 22,000 and 8,000, became an advertising agent throughout the country that it was useless to try to get a home on these forest reserves. The result is that to-day they have turned aside from an effort to get the land. Now and then a man will have the hardihood and the courage and the patience and endurance to undertake to do so; but, however much they may desire a home, the result is that, these applications having been refused to that extent and the hardships being known, settlements within the forest reserves have practically ceased to be of any moment—not because the lands are not there. If it did not so happen that there are forest reservations where the agricultural lands are, you would see them settled in a few months.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BORAH. I will yield in a few moments. They were opening some public lands in the State of Washington a few months ago, and the settlers formed in a line and stayed in line night and day, and had food carried to them for over three months, in order to have an opportunity to file upon those lands. The people are land hungry. I do not know how any man with a proper conception of the welfare of our people as a whole can withhold aid and support to a man who cuts himself loose from society and undertakes under these adverse circumstances to make a home.

I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would ask the Senator from Idaho whether these lands can be cultivated without irrigation.

Mr. BORAH. Some of them can. In the northern part of the State we do not irrigate at all. That is a rainfall country. In the southern part there must be irrigation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Are the entries that are attempted mainly in the humid region or are they in the arid?

Mr. BORAH. I have no information upon that subject, but so far as this letter is concerned——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to ask the Senator another question.

Mr. BORAH. I only know that in the northern part of the State where I undertook to get a large part of the land eliminated, which had been burnt over and where beautiful gardens and fine fields were growing up right to the edge of the land owned by the Government of the United States, it was rejected because it was not agricultural land.

Mr. NEWLANDS. What I wished to inquire was whether it was possible to establish a real home upon land in that region without irrigation.

Mr. BORAH. It would not be possible to establish a home in some places in the arid region without the use of water, of course, for domestic purposes. In many places in the arid lands they make fine homes by the way of dry farming where they can only have sufficient water for domestic purposes. Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does not the Senator feel that in a number of these cases—of course we want to do justice to this service——

Mr. BORAH. I am exceedingly anxious to do justice to them.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And fair treatment. Is it not true that in a great many of these cases where the applications have been rejected the entry was made ostensibly for the purpose of securing a home, but really for the purpose of securing the timber, and the land was not serviceable for agriculture at all because of the lack of either rain or facility for irrigation?

Mr. BORAH. Let me ask the Senator from Nevada a question. Does the Senator know of any such case?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No, I do not; but I assume from the general character of the country that it is practically impossible to cultivate throughout that region unless there is sufficient rainfall, or unless there is such underground moisture as to permit what is called dry farming, or unless there is irrigation; and hence I can see that applications might be made for homestead entries and all the rules be complied with in reference to residence, and so forth, when the real purpose was not to establish a home but simply to get title to timber land. I can conceive that that is quite possible. I can not believe that the Forest Service is so cruel as to deny an entry, to cancel an entry, to reject it, where there is any substantial reason for believing that the entryman can establish a home and where there is no reason for believing that he has some other purpose in view than to establish a home.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am rather surprised at the argument of the Senator from Nevada, coming from a man from the West. I know that there prevails among our eastern friends the supposition that every man who undertakes to get himself connected with the public domain is a thief.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. That has been——

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BORAH. That has been the difficulty in dealing with this subject from the beginning. Without evidence, without proof, without facts, the supposition was that the would-be settler was trying to steal a piece of the public domain.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to disclaim any such idea. But I was insisting that it is a fact that great interests in that entire region have sought to acquire large areas of land either for a grazing monopoly or a timber monopoly, and have sought to utilize men who called themselves settlers with a view to getting title to land under laws to which they are not entitled.

Now, I have no sympathy for that class of settlers, and I have no sympathy for the men who attempt to utilize that kind of a man. I am quite prepared to believe that the national services have been perhaps extreme and severe and overcritical, and that their vigilance and restriction ought to be relaxed, but I can not believe that they are so wanting in worthiness of purpose that they deliberately deny entrymen the right to enter upon land that is capable of being made a home. Doubtless there have been mistakes, but I can not believe there is any deliberate purpose.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator from Nevada listen while I read to him one of the reports of a special agent upon one of these applications?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly. I will be very glad to hear it.

Mr. BORAH. I could present a number of others.

DEAR SIR: Your application, No. 10, for forest homestead * * * is on file in the office of the district forester. * * * In order that the forester may determine what lands to recommend for listing, it is desirable that a demonstration be made of its agricultural possibilities, and to this end I would suggest that you take out a special-use permit for 40 acres of the tract applied for and experiment upon it. * * * It is believed that two years should be sufficient to demonstrate whether the land will produce farm crops of enough value to justify its listing for agricultural entry. If results are such that your application is rejected—

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I would like to know what we are doing. Is the Senator joking or is he reading?

Mr. BORAH. I am reading from a special agent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Sure enough?

Mr. BORAH. This is too serious for a joke with me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wanted to know what it was. It sounded like a parody to me.

Mr. BORAH. It is not a parody.

If results are such that your application is rejected, but if you still desire to continue occupancy of the 40 acres under special-use permit, you may be allowed to do so upon the payment of the usual annual charges.

Now, does the Senator from Nevada think that there would be any possible way in the world for a real homesteader to get a title to that land under such rules and regulations unless he had a fortune to start with and wanted to experiment for three or four years?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, it is quite possible that a mistake was made in that case, but I judge from the reading that the land referred to was probably land which we would denominate as grazing land, not land that is capable of cultivation, but land which is simply useful for grazing.

Mr. BORAH. What is there in this statement which leads the Senator from Nevada to think that probably that was so?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I assume from the letter that the appearance of the land itself was such as to preclude the idea of the possibility of agriculture, but that the entryman being insistent upon it that the land could be farmed, the department said, "Very well; we will give you an opportunity to demonstrate it, notwithstanding the fact that the land itself appears as dry as a bone." I can understand such a condition of things.

I do not know whether that was the condition of things; but we will assume now that, as we know is frequently the case, there is a vast area of land suitable for grazing, but absolutely unsuited for agriculture, and therefore land which does not come at all within the operation of the homestead act, because it is impossible to create a home upon it; and we will assume that the man who is ranging his cattle over that vast area wants to get a title to a particular tract of land, and he gets some man to enter upon it as a homestead, and he makes his entry, and the department says, "This is arid land incapable of being made"——

Mr. BORAH. Does it take two years to say so?

Mr. NEWLANDS. We will assume that the entryman replies, "But I can demonstrate that this land can be farmed." Very well, then; the department gives him an opportunity to make the demonstration. I can understand how such a letter could be written without involving either absurdity or injustice.

The trouble is that we of the West have not seen to it that the proper laws have been presented with reference to the entering up of the public domain. There could be a grazing homestead created. We have never yet sought to create a grazing homestead. What would a grazing homestead be? A homestead capable of supporting a family; 160 acres of land under the homestead act? No; 16,000 acres possibly might support a family, and in some regions 8,000 or 5,000.

Now, if we want to create a grazing homestead, let us say so and let us provide the conditions under which a grazing homestead can be entered and the number of acres that can be entered, but do not keep this defective system of laws upon the statute book which will compel a man, in order to get some habitation in a great grazing area to avail himself of the homestead act, and then endeavor to prove that the land is agricultural land when it is perfectly demonstrable that it can not be farmed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I perfectly agree with the Senator from Nevada that we ought to have a change in the homestead laws; and I wish my friend would report from the conference committee my bill on the three-year homestead. I am sure that will be a good beginning.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to suggest that if the Senator would arrange, or if some one else can arrange, to enable the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] to place in the RECORD photographs of the so-called agricultural homestead entries in some of these forest reservations, it will enable the readers of the RECORD to see that many of those so-called agricultural homestead entries have been made so that the houses which have been constructed stand in the primeval forest, and show upon their face that they were fraudulent. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho whether he criticizes the Forestry Bureau for rejecting so-called agricultural homestead entries of that sort? The photographs are here, and I understand the Senator from Oregon expects to use them as the basis for some remarks. I wish they could be put in the RECORD so that everyone could see the character of some of these so-called agricultural homestead entries.

Mr. BORAH. I regret that the rest of us will not receive the same exhilaration that the Senator from Nebraska seems to have received from those photographs. I have seen them before. Has the Senator from Oregon any photographs from Idaho? These are faithful old photographs. They have done faithful service in this cause for 10 long years. They have excited the zeal and aroused the enthusiasm of men of these days as the bones of some immortal saint once set on fire the soul of the crusader. But because a half a dozen men sought homes in these places, even wrongfully, shall we vicariously pursue all honest homebuilders until the end of time?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think I have any from Idaho, Mr. President, but I have a number of photographs taken from some of the other States where attempts were made to secure lands within forest reserves as suited for agricultural purposes. I believe all of these pictures show that the entries are on the sides of mountains in valuable timber belts and could not have been taken for any other purpose than to secure the timber on them. I do not mean to say that that is universally true, but I do say that that is true in a very great many cases; and where patents have issued and where suits have been instituted by the United States an acknowledgment of this condition has been made by a reconveyance of the lands to the Government of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, all that has absolutely nothing to do with the proposition which I have insisted upon, and that is that the Interior Department classify this land and turn it over to entry. If it is timberland, do not classify it as agricultural land. We are not asking for permission to enter timberland as agricultural land. Nobody who is honest desires to take up the timberland in the West as agricultural lands; but that does not relieve the Secretary of Agriculture from classifying those lands which are agricultural lands and turning them open to entry. It is all in the hands of the department, and it need only throw open to entry the agricultural lands. This would put both the fraudulent entryman and also the photographer out of business.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If I may again interrupt the Senator, I desire to say that this is an immense empire in itself which the Government has undertaken to administer, and that it has attempted and is attempting to do, and is proceeding to do, exactly what the Senator from Idaho says it ought to do, but it can not be done in a day. In proof of what I say, I desire to suggest that the very lands that have been listed by the Federal authorities as suited for agricultural entry have not been filed upon or taken for agricultural purposes by homesteaders. In the Senator's own State, as I said awhile ago, 16 per cent of the lands that have been listed as suitable for agricultural entry have not been attempted to be taken as homesteads.

Mr. BORAH. Can the Senator from Oregon advise the Senator from Idaho where those lands are located in Idaho?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I could not undertake to do so; it would take definite maps of location from the office of the department to do that. I presume they could do it.

I wish to say I differ from the Senator from Idaho with reference to the causes which have invited emigration to Canada. Canada is in the condition just now that our western frontier was in 25 or even 40 years ago. Men have not gone there because they could not get homesteads in the western part of our country, but simply because the allurements there are greater; the land which is untaken and unsettled upon is better than it is in the United States; and men will continue to go there until nothing is left in Canada except forest lands, just as is the case in the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have had a great many letters from homesteaders moving in the direction of Canada, after having made an attempt to secure homes in different parts of the United States. I presume that some men have gone to Canada for the reasons which the Senator from Oregon states; but does the Senator state that there is any better land in Canada than is to be found in the State of Oregon or in the State of Idaho or in the other States lying along the border line of Canada? There is no better land, when once reclaimed, than this land in his State, except the State of Idaho. There is no climate in Canada like our climate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do claim, Mr. President, that there are lands in Canada, or there have been until very recently, that are better for homestead entry than those in any of our Western States. I know men in Oregon who have gone up into that country simply because they could get lands that were suitable for agricultural purposes and because, as they said, the laws were a little more liberal; but there are lands in that country that are better for agricultural entry than we have in our Western States, because the best lands in the West have already been taken up and nothing remains except those which are within the forest reserves.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I referred a short time ago to the great fires which took place in 1910 and 1911 and was diverted from the discussion by another phase of this controversy. I want to recur to that again. Those fires left a vast amount of timber which could have been successfully used if it had been taken in time and which would have been of great benefit not only to the settlers who happened to have homesteads on some of the land over which the burning took place, but would have been of benefit to the public by reason of its getting cheaper timber. I invite the Senate's attention to the difficulties under which the settler labors in getting a hearing upon these matters. I spoke perhaps abruptly a short time ago when interrupted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I did not mean to charge this prejudice or this feeling to individuals, but it is a lack of information; and out of that lack of information arises such ideas apparently as have been suggested here by reason of these photographs and other things, that we are trying to steal some lands in the West. There have been some land frauds in the West—comparatively few; with reference to agricultural lands, almost none. There have been frauds with reference to timberlands, but that is a matter that we are not discussing; it is a matter which the department can control. It need not classify or permit the entry of any timberlands under present conditions. We are not asking to enter on any timberlands, but we simply ask that agricultural lands be disposed of.

We are also asking that a proper use be made of the timber which is growing upon the forest reserves. This timber ripens, falls, rots, or burns, just the same as anything else in the course of growth. It is absolutely necessary, in order to protect the forests, that this timber which ought to be disposed of shall be disposed of. It is not only desirable from the standpoint of the people who might want to use it, but it is desirable in protecting the forests themselves, because, as I have suggested, they get into such a condition that it is impossible to keep destructive fires away from them, unless the fallen timber or timber which ripens and ought to be cut, is cut and taken out.

After the forest fires had swept over this country, we introduced here a bill providing:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to sell and dispose of to the highest bidder, at public auction or through sealed bids, timber on lands of the United States, outside of national forests, that may have been killed or seriously and permanently damaged by forest fires prior to December 1, 1910, the proceeds of all such sales to be covered into the Treasury, as are other receipts from the sales or disposition of public lands.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior, under regulations to be prescribed by him, is hereby authorized, upon application by the claimant, to sell or permit the sale of timber killed or seriously and permanently damaged by forest fires prior to December 1, 1910, on any lands of the United States embraced within any lawful filing, selection, location, grant, claim, or appropriation subsisting on the 1st day of December, 1910: Provided, That timber on such lands within the exterior boundaries of national forests shall be disposed of under joint regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture and Secretary of the Interior. All moneys arising from sales of timber in accordance with such regulations and coming into the hands of officers or agents of the United States shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as a special fund, to be designated the "Burnt timber fund."

SEC. 3. Any settler or entryman under the homestead laws who has complied with the laws and regulations prior to the time of the fire, and who at the date of application for the sale has not abandoned his claim, shall be paid an amount which shall bear the same proportion to the total amount received from the sale of timber from his claim which his residence on the land bears to the total residence required by law, such payment to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury from the special fund provided for in section 2 upon the certificate of the Secretary of the Interior that such settler or entryman is entitled thereto.

That bill passed both Houses of Congress, went to the President of the United States, and was vetoed. It was not vetoed apparently by reason of any judgment which the President exercised in regard to it, nor by reason of any information which he apparently had as to its defects, but, as the President said, it was vetoed upon the suggestion of the head of the department. The President said:

I return herewith H. R. 9845 without approval. My objections to the bill are stated in the communication of the Secretary of the Interior that accompanies this message. I hope that the difficulty which the Secretary points out may be remedied, because I approve of the general relief sought by the bill.

Now, I should like to call attention to the difficulty which the Secretary of the Interior points out.

The difficulties of administration were pointed out in a communication from this department to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, of which I inclose a copy. So far as appears from the record, this communication was not brought to the attention of, or considered by, either House of Congress. The principal objection to the bill is the provision, contained in section 3 thereof, requiring the payment to "any settler or entryman under the homestead laws who has complied with the laws and regulations prior to the time of the fire, and who, at the date of application for the sale, has not abandoned his claim" of "an amount which shall bear the same proportion to the total amount received from the sale of timber from his claim which his residence on the land bears to the total residence required by law," etc.

You will see that the bill provided that, if the homesteader had complied with the law and the rules and regulations up to the time of the fire, he was to be paid a portion of the money realized from the sale in proportion to the time which he had lived upon his land. This was burned timber; it must come to naught; it must rot and become worthless unless disposed of. The Secretary of the Interior says:

This would give to any settler or entryman under the homestead laws a part, at least, of the proceeds of the timber on his claim without any regard whatever to whether the settler or entryman ultimately perfected his claim and obtained a patent for the land.

There can not be any finer exhibition of the harsh and impossible administration of the law by this department for the settler than is exhibited in this veto and the foundation of the veto. Men had gone upon the public domain, settled upon the land, and complied with the law and the regulations. Fire swept over their land and they were refused that which was left after the fire had gone over it or a compensation in proportion to the time they had spent on the land for fear that they might not complete proof two or three years afterwards. In other words, although the settler had thus far complied with the law, so strong was the presumption that in the future he would not comply with it that he is dealt with as a criminal instead of an honest man. Rather than to permit the settler to take advantage of the adverse circumstances under which he was placed in this matter, he was denied relief; and it was said, in effect, that the timber had better rot than that the citizen should have the benefit of it. Every possible embarrassment was put in his way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Complied with the law thereafter.

Mr. BORAH. Unless he should thereafter fully comply with the law. There is a suspicion that he is not going to do so; there is a suspicion that he is there for an evil purpose; that he is a criminal; that the surveillance of the law must rest upon him constantly, as if he were a professional crook. He is deprived of that which must now be utterly worthless either to himself or to anyone else. Can anyone tell me why such a rule should be invoked against those who are attempting to make homes under these adverse circumstances? Is there anything connected with the lives and deeds of those men who are settling up the great Northwest, who are engaged in building communities—is there anything connected with the lives of such men as to warrant this constant suspicion which puts upon them the ban and condemnation of the law and of the Government? But rather than give him aid under the circumstances, the President sends here a veto, exercising no judgment of his own and no knowledge of his own, but simply taking the suggestion of the head of a department. These are the circumstances under which we undertake to legislate. This is unlimited, unrestrained bureaucracy in all its naked, unvarnished, impudent, insolent, autocratic power.

I am not going to discuss it at length, but, as a kindred subject, I want to call attention to the manner in which we deal with settlers upon confessedly agricultural lands upon Government reclamation projects, and so forth, because it is all a part of the same subject matter.

Something has been said with reference to the Canadian laws being somewhat more lenient than our laws. They are considerably so; they are built upon a humane basis and administered from a humane standpoint. I now read from the Canadian law:

In case of sickness, and on that account inability on the part of the new settler to perform the required duties, his homestead is protected—that is to say, an extension period is granted him by the department of the interior, so that instead of performing all his duties in three years he may be permitted four or five, as the case may be. In any event, no advantage is taken of his sickness to deprive him of the homestead upon which he has placed his labor and perhaps his capital.

In case of sickness in his family and consequent destitution, due either to insufficient capital or to extra expenditure for medicines and medical help, the new homesteader has the right to appeal to the immigration department of the interior.

Inquiry is made into the situation, and if it is found that the settler, through no fault of his own, is lacking in food, fuel, or clothing, this is provided by the department and a lien taken upon the homestead for the amount advanced to the homesteader with 6 per cent interest added, the homesteader understanding that he can not become possessed of the final title until he has met and liquidated all the advances of the Government. In cases where the homesteader has suffered partial or total failure of crop from hail, fire, or other untoward circumstances and where he is still upon land for which he has not received his patent, the department of the interior will advance him a reasonable quantity of seed wheat and seed oats to enable him to get upon his feet again and proceed with his spring sowing. The amount of this grain, the actual cost of the grain itself plus transportation only, is made a charge upon the homesteader.

The department makes no charge for administration, the cost price of the grain and transportation only being a debt upon the homestead and payable before the patent is issued. In cases of prairie fire or in cases of prolonged sickness the department of the interior is always willing to help the homesteader to his feet again, and in very few instances indeed has the recipient failed to make proper payment of his indebtedness.

The Canadian Government trusts the homesteader and the homesteader deals fairly with the Canadian Government. If you will place our homestead laws and regulations, the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, and the veto message of the President based thereon—because I do not think the President had any knowledge about it at all—alongside the rules and regulations and the law of the Canadian Government, you will find the precise difficulty with which we have to deal. On the one hand, the Government believes in its homesteaders; it believes in its home builders; it is willing to help them; it trusts them; it assumes when they come upon the public domain that they are there as law-abiding citizens. On the other hand, I must say, regardless of whom it hits or hurts, that for the last 10 years the homesteader of the West has been pursued in every possible way to embarrass him and discourage him in the settlement of the public lands. He has been presumed to be guilty of evil purposes and criminal designs; he has been compelled to meet the most technical rules, and he has been held up in his proof and his patent until some special agent would give him a chance to meet the presumption always against him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will permit me to interrupt him, I should like to tell about a case that was recently submitted to me of a homestead entry in the United States, which, it seems to me, is in violent opposition to the theory of liberality and humanity underlying the Canadian law. I received a letter from a man in the State of Florida who had entered land which was classified by the department as agricultural land.

Mr. BORAH. Was this in Canada?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; it was in the State of Florida. This is a contrast to the administration and law in Canada. He remained upon the land two years or more, built a house, built fences, cleared a good part of the land, plowed it, and in boring a well, or something of that kind, phosphate was discovered, whereupon the Government took the land away from him and paid him not a cent for the money that he had expended for fences, for his house, for plowing, and so forth. Of course, as the Senator from Idaho will understand, and as everybody who understands farming will understand, he had made a loss for the first two years, as all men must; and there he was left.

That is the practical administration of the United States laws with regard to homesteaders, even in one of the old States upon lands classified by the Government as agricultural. They based their injustice upon the ground that in his application he had stated that the land was agricultural. Of course he had stated it, for no other reason than because the Government had so stated. He did not know any more about the phosphate under it than did the Government or anybody else. There may be some justice in refusing to allow him to retain the phosphate mine, but there can be no justice in refusing to let him cultivate the land above the phosphate mine, and there certainly can be no justice in not permitting him to be repaid for the expense which he had incurred upon the faith of a classification by the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Mississippi that a thing like that could not happen under the Canadian law, for when a homesteader in Canada makes his entry the Canadian Government reserves all the timber, the water rights, and the minerals, and requires a certain amount of cultivation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Utah has totally misunderstood me. I have no objection to the Government reserving the minerals; I have no objection to the Government taking possession of the phosphate on the entry to which I have referred and proceeding to exploit and sell it, or to do whatever it wants to do with it, but certainly to take a man's homestead away from him after his expenditure of money solely upon the ground that there was phosphate upon the land is a totally different proposition. I do not care whether Canada is perpetrating an equal injustice or not. I thought it was not; but if it is, then Canada is equally guilty of injustice. Even if the Government has the right to take all the land away from a man because a mineral has been found upon it, there ought to be some provision to put him back in statu quo ante at any rate. No honest man dealing with another would perpetrate an act like that which the Government of the United States perpetrated on this man. I would not perpetrate it upon you, nor would you upon me. It is positively dishonest.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, what I was going to say to the Senator was that our homestead laws of course reserve nothing whatever to the Government, and it is for that reason the Government makes these long, expensive examinations.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. FALL. If the Senator will yield to me for a question, Is it not a fact, under our homestead laws, that until the homesteader has proven up upon the land the homestead is subject to Federal entry, and if it is found that it is more valuable for mineral than it is for agricultural purposes, he can not get a patent for it; and only after patent passes does the Government pass title to the mineral?

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. FALL. It now requires five years to prove up a homestead, and if there is any mineral in the homestead entry, then anyone has five years' time within which to prove that it is mineral land and he can take it away from you during that time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the duties which the Canadian Government performs toward its settlers are left in this country to be performed by those who are disposed to help their fellow citizen or, in some instances, to corporations. Last year the settlers upon the south side of Minnidoka project, so called, having been without water with which to irrigate the land for three or four or five years, were in an impoverished and distressed condition. They had no seed with which to seed their ground. They were required to pay the maintenance charge if they used the water, and they had no means with which to pay it. They were simply in a condition to immediately forfeit everything and move away. The Government could not, it seemed to think, help the situation, and at this time is insisting on payment in advance for the use of the water upon the part of those settlers.

Everyone knows, Mr. President, that for the first two or three years upon these lands a person raises nothing; the land is in such condition that you can not realize upon it. But that which the Government did not do and could not do by reason of our laws or by reason of the unwillingness of the department one of the railroads of the West undertook to do. Mr. Bancroft, at the head of the Oregon Short Line Railroad Co., a railroad man with an intellectual vision, realizing that to build up his constituency is to build up his road, and having an unusual pride in that country, where he has lived so long, advised his corporation to advance these settlers $20,000 worth of seed grain for the purpose of enabling them to raise a crop and save their lands. The faith which Mr. Bancroft exhibited toward the settlers and the confidence which he reposed in them were justified, and the settlers proceeded to utilize the means given to them for the purpose of raising crops and made a comparative success of it in so far as they could on that new land. This is not only a splendid encomium to Mr. Bancroft, but a sad commentary upon our harsh and inelastic public-land laws.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator refers to the harshness of our laws. It is not the harshness of the law, is it, so much as it is the harshness of the administration of the law?

Mr. BORAH. Well, I think it is the harshness of the law to some extent, as I am going to discuss in a few moments.

Mr. SMOOT. I think there is a misapprehension as to the difference between our homestead law and the Canadian law. I think that our homestead law is a better law for the settler or the entryman than the Canadian law, because in the Canadian law the reservations that are made are such as I do not believe ought to be imposed upon an entryman in this country. They reserve, as I said before, the water-power sites, they reserve all timber, they reserve all minerals of every kind, and they require a certain amount of cultivation.

Mr. BORAH. The Government of the United States has withdrawn all power sites and withdrawn all mineral lands and all those things.

Mr. SMOOT. Not all minerals.

Mr. BORAH. When a man goes into the land office to make his proof of an agricultural entry, he never can get the land if it is mineral in character.

Mr. SMOOT. He can get it if it is metalliferous mineral, not phosphate or asphaltum or gas.

Mr. GRONNA. Or coal.

Mr. SMOOT. Or coal.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose the man goes to prove up an agricultural entry, and the officers say that that land is more valuable for minerals than for agricultural purposes; they refuse his patent.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; as agricultural land, but not if entered as mineral land.

What I say is this: If an entryman enters land in Canada and makes his home on the land and secures his patent and lives there 20 or 30 or 40 years, and at the end of that time there are minerals found under the surface of his entry, the minerals do not belong to the entrymen, but to the Canadian Government.

Mr. BORAH. No one desires to have anybody acquire mineral lands under an agricultural entry.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. BORAH. We do not want him to acquire timberlands as agricultural lands. The Government has to be protected in all these things. It should be protected against a man acquiring land as agricultural land when, in fact, it is mineral land.

Mr. SMOOT. I was speaking only so far as the land is concerned, and I say the difficulties are more a matter of regulation than a matter of law.

Mr. GRONNA. I know that in my State, when the proof is made, no patent is issued for any land, whether it contains coal or not, except a limited patent or surface patent.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator must certainly be mistaken in that particular.

Mr. GRONNA. I am not mistaken. I want to say to the Senator from Utah that I have had hundreds of complaints from settlers in the Northwest within the last month that the land office would not issue a receipt unless the settler would consent or agree to accept a surface patent.

Mr. BORAH. There is no question about that.

Mr. SMOOT. Where lands are classified as coal lands, there is no doubt about it.

Mr. GRONNA. In our State it is all withdrawn.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the Senator is correct in his statement, but I take it for granted that there are lands in that State that were not withdrawn lands. But if they had been withdrawn as coal lands, the statement is absolutely correct as made by the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not want the Senator from Utah or any other Senator on this floor to infer that they are mineral lands. They are not.

They may secure some poor lignite coal way down in the bowels of the earth; and I can tell you of cases that have come under my observation. A farmer might have dug a well, and after he had lived there four or five years and had earned his patent—not a commutation proof—this has happened. In one instance I knew the man who had lived there for seven years, and one of these sleuths, for whom there has been a million dollars appropriated every year by the Congress of the United States, came to this particular settler. He proceeded to ask him all sorts of questions about his family and everything else, and then he asked him if he knew whether there was any coal on the farm.

The farmer said, "No, I hardly think so, for I dug two wells on the north side of this pasture and there was no coal; but on the south side where I dug a well, down about 25 or 30 feet, there was a vein about 6 inches thick." His entry was held up, and it was held up for five or six years before the man was given a patent. That is the treatment the people of my State are receiving at the hands of this administration.

Mr. SMOOT. That is regulation again.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota whether he approves of the Canadian system of law, under which you could enter as a homestead the surface, and without any restraint of any kind, the law reserving to the Government the minerals under the surface. Such a law would do away with this army of special agents who, under existing law, are classifying the lands and enable the entire surface to be entered.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not suppose it would change the conditions very much if I stated my opinion. But I believe that where the Government finds minerals, whether it is coal or any other, the Government should control it. But I do not believe that the Government should go on and classify land, which clearly is nothing but agricultural in character, as mineral lands and should withdraw it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator believes that the land should be withdrawn if it is mineral land, and that no patent should be granted reserving the minerals under the land?

Mr. GRONNA. I believe that land which is mineral in character should be classified as mineral land, and that land which is agricultural in character should be classified as agricultural land and the full fee given to the settler.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Canadian law does away entirely with the necessity of classifying the land, and thus enables a man to get a homestead title to the surface for agricultural purposes, and leaves open for future consideration the question whether there is any mineral under it or not.

Mr. GRONNA. I have not here the Canadian law relating to mineral lands, but I will say to the Senator from Nevada that the conditions of getting land under the mineral laws of Canada are far different from ours. There are provisions under which you can patent lands in Canada as mineral lands.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I suppose the theory advanced by the Senator from Nevada is the old theory, that all the minerals belong to the king or crown. That theory has never obtained in this country. I think it is contrary to the ideas of our Government, and I hope it will always remain contrary.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Canadian laws were passed as the result of the conservation movement. Their laws are exceedingly simple in operation. They can dispense altogether with these agents who now in this country spend a great deal of time in classifying lands. It permits the entry of the surface.

It may be a question whether we should accept that, but I want to emphasize that this legislation in Canada does not follow the old law with respect to the rights of the sovereign to the minerals, but is enlightened legislation passed as a result of the conservation movement. Canada joined in it, and her representatives having gone back to Canada, they secured this legislation as a part of the conservation plan.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will ask the Senator if Canada parts with the fee to her mineral lands.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can not answer.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask not by way of argument, but solely for information.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I assume there are laws there under which mineral entries can be made.

Mr. HEYBURN. Canada does give crown grants for mineral lands, and they to all intents and purposes pass the fee.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Do they not retain a royalty?

Mr. HEYBURN. No. I am speaking now of the Northwest Territory, with which I am somewhat familiar.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have detained the Senate entirely too long, and I can imagine how wearying it must be to Senators to listen to this long discussion. We people of the West, who feel that our most vital interests are involved in such discussions, welcome them. We feel that under present conditions we never can become the great Commonwealth we ought to become. Therefore it is vital to us.

It is not our desire to find fault with individuals in a department. It is the system. Individuals come and go; and while they come in with resolutions and promises, we find a few months after they get here it is impossible to discriminate between the successor and the predecessor. It is for the purpose of calling into sympathy and cooperation the wisdom of those who have had the advantage of their natural resources and the legislators of the East that we undertake to discuss these matters at such length, certainly not simply with the desire of personally finding fault with some one.

Something has been said—and considerable has been said—with reference to the Canadian laws, and I will say a few words upon that subject, and will not detain the Senate longer.

The Canadian law is a three-year homestead. It only requires a residence of three years. It permits absence from the homestead for six months out of the year. This to enable the homesteader to go elsewhere to acquire some means with which to carry him through the summer or to go somewhere and secure the advantage of schools; and it is the consensus of opinion of those who have examined into this matter that instead of its leading to speculation and fraud and to the acquisition of lands for the benefit of others, it has had the very opposite result.

It has led to a bona fide class of citizens, who are building up the country and are now making one of the greatest countries in the world out of the great Dominion of Canada.

I want it distinctly understood that I am not asking the privilege of the looseness of the law which will permit a man to acquire mineral land under an agricultural entry, or timberland under an agricultural entry, or a power site under an agricultural entry. There is nothing of that kind possible under our present system, even if we change the law as to residence and absence. There is no necessity for the Government to permit or authorize such action. The Government has all these lands, covering power sites, and so forth, withdrawn, and therefore not subject to entry. No need to worry, therefore, about a homesteader securing a power site under an agricultural entry.

What we want and what we are going to have—whether it is to-day or later—is an opportunity for the man who is trying to make a farm to do so without being driven to poverty and expatriation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Some little time ago I asked the Senator a question, which was a very civil one, and I thought the Senator was rather petulant in his reply.

Mr. BORAH. I apologize to the Senator if I did, but I did not intend to. I have the utmost respect for the suggestions of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator for that assurance. I believe it. I thought perhaps the Senator had not spoken with due consideration.

Mr. President, speaking as one eastern man, I will say that if the Senators who represent the States which have forest reserves in them—162 in number—and with a comparatively few States interested in the forest reserves could agree upon a policy and upon amendments to the existing law that would satisfy them, I feel very confident that every Senator from New England, at least, would be glad to cooperate with them to bring about a better condition of things than seems to exist.

The East has no prejudice against the West. On the contrary, we have great admiration for those great western States that are developing into such great Commonwealths, and we all want to help the West in any matters that interest her and in which we can properly cooperate.

I recall the fact that one of the best Secretaries of the Interior since my service in public life was an eastern man, Mr. Bliss. I think every western Senator will agree to that. He was a broad-minded man, and I think he compared more than favorably with some men from farther West who have occupied that office.

I assure the Senator from Idaho that before the debate closes he need not fear opposition, but rather earnest and friendly cooperation, from those of us who know comparatively little about this question, but have an interest in it, because it is a national problem, and we want to be helpful rather than to be in the way of real progress.

I thank the Senator from Idaho for yielding to me.

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to join in the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire. Throughout the long years when we have been making this fight on behalf of the interests peculiar to the western people, the Senator from New Hampshire has always acted with us.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank you.

Mr. BORAH. I did not intend by any remarks I made this afternoon to be personal to the Senator from New Hampshire or personal to any other Senator on this floor. I was speaking of the feeling entertained in the East with reference to conditions in the West in the acquisition of public lands. It is not personal. It is too universal to be personal. Everybody has it, whether he is conscious of it or not. The moment you introduce a law here for the purpose of ameliorating conditions in the West, and if you do not get it here on the floor of the Senate you get it from the public print, that western Senators are trying to make it easier for somebody to steal land, and the hired magazine writers and people engaged in creating this prejudice have more influence in destroying a bill than we have in passing it. I am not petulant or desirous of being unnecessarily harsh, but from this time on so long as those men who are building up that great Northwest are attacked, I propose to call things by their right name. I have seen them in their adversity; I have witnessed their struggles; I know what they are doing; and the man who for a miserable pittance libels them in a magazine is unworthy to be counted with the same race to which they belong.

Mr. President, several months ago a bill was put upon its passage through the Congress having for its purpose the amelioration of the harsh terms of the law under which settlers are now seeking to secure homes upon the public domain. It passed this body. With some amendments it passed the House. It is now resting in conference, where it has been for weeks. Its friends are by no means satisfied with the outlook for its becoming a law at this session. It has been opposed, it seems, from the beginning by the Secretary of the Interior. It has been sought to be amended and emasculated by all that class of men who proceed upon the suspicion that every citizen who seeks through months and years of adversity and hardship to carve a home from the desert is a criminal. I am sure if these men were there to see, if they could know the relentless way in which the Government has pursued the homesteader for years, the annoyance, the delay to which he is subjected, the price he pays in labor and effort for his land, that they as honest and well-meaning men would change their minds. There are some few men, Mr. President, so imbued with the worth of their own self-sufficient, all sufficient, insufficient knowledge that perhaps seeing the situation and realizing that there existed a different condition from that which they assumed would only irritate and make revengful their offended wisdom. There are a few others whose suspicious natures resent all facts which do not fit their preconceived determination to adjudge all men except themselves dishonest. But it has pleased divine Providence to afflict this earth with but few of either of these classes. Most men want to know the facts and knowing the facts have the courage to accept them and be governed by them.

Now, what are the facts? We are no longer giving homes upon the rich prairies of the great Mississippi Valley. The settler must now seek the arid lands in that country which stood for half a century marked upon our maps as the great American desert. When reclaimed, I grant you, these lands are fertile. When reduced to habitation I concede they make homes as desirable as anywhere under the shining sun. But it takes labor and much of it; it takes patience and endurance more than most men are willing to give; it necessitates submission to isolation, to adversity, to hardship, to depriving oftentimes the family of schools in order to reclaim this land which, as it lies there, is wholly worthless, which serves no one and pays no taxes to the Government. It is a dry, barren soil. Oftentimes for several seasons you can not raise a crop until the soil becomes settled and compact. I have seen a crop planted to-day and to-morrow it might be 10 miles away, blown thither by the winds—actually blown out of the ground. The settler must not only build his house and make his improvements, clear the land of sagebrush, but he must either build a ditch at heavy expense or pay more heavily for others to build it for him. I assert that no man reclaims this land who does not pay every dollar it is worth in the labor which he must expend in doing so. No man gets title to a homestead or desert entry who does not give evidence a hundred times over of his good faith, of his bona fides as a settler and a home builder. Men who talk glibly about giving these men homes do not know the facts. These men by their labor and their sacrifices have changed our worthless arid waste into tax-paying and valuable properties, but they have paid for them in their labor. What does this Government have these lands for—for jack rabbits and coyotes or for men? If for men, is not he a good citizen to be commended and not condemned who takes such property and makes it by his own effort a valuable estate? Would you have your lands lie idle while your citizens crowd more and more into the congested centers? Would you prefer to continue to increase the number of consumers and decrease the number of producers? Do you want less food and more to consume it? I look upon the man who seeks to make an acre productive, which was not productive before, not only as a good citizen himself, but as a distinct benefactor to his fellow men. He is the man who is going to solve the question of the high cost of living if it is ever solved. These men ought to be encouraged instead of discouraged by every petty rule and regulation which the meddlesome impudence of suspicion can throw about them.

It is beyond my comprehension, Mr. President, how any man with the slightest quiverings of a conscience or the faintest conception of what it takes to make a great people and a great republic can do other than encourage, aid, and seek in every way to make successful the efforts of the family which cuts loose from friends and neighbors and schools and goes out in these places for the purpose of satisfying the noblest cravings of man as a social being, his craving for a home. This settler takes that which is worthless as it lies there in the arid desert and makes it a home—and this Government now and for years has put upon him the suspicion of crime, the surveillance and annoyance which it does not even throw around its professional criminals who infest society. The executive officers of this Government, with their hired spies, have haunted the homesteader, leered upon him as he left his solitary lodging, watched his coming and going like Javert upon the trial of Jean val Jean, until it has ceased to be endurable any longer. Talk about these men not being law-abiding. If they were not so, sir, more than one special agent would have paid for lawless methods with his life.

Is this Congress going to adjourn without passing these laws? Will you go before the people of the West in the coming campaign and tell them you were afraid to make just and humane laws for them because you regarded them as all speculators and thieves? Are you going to say to these settlers who are holding on and endeavoring to make both ends meet that you would have passed these laws, but the Secretary of the Interior was passing through the gestation period of an idea and the hour of his intellectual accouchment had not yet arrived? And do not think the settlers alone are interested. The entire West is interested. It will no longer be satisfied with promises. Our eastern politicians, who make their summer excursions into the West and talk about what they are going to do, will have to begin to make good their promises. Let me assure them that the West now expects a fulfillment of those pledges.

The party of Lincoln, who rejoiced in the opportunity to sign the first homestead bill, should have the fidelity to its original principles, the foresight, the courage, the statesmanship, to put aside the miserable slanders and ignorant libels upon the people of the West and be of assistance to these people who are impoverished and bankrupted and even expatriated in their efforts to secure a home. Is the great Republican Party going to continue to connive at these slanders of the West and bow like a bastinadoed elephant at the crack of the whip from those who assert that you must make the laws so harsh and impossible as to drive away citizens into Canada in order to keep them from stealing if they remain at home.

And you, my friends, the disciples of Democracy—the creed of the man of small holdings—how much longer will you favor laws which make it impossible for any but a rich man to get a piece of the public domain for a home? I remember that James Buchanan vetoed the first homestead bill which passed Congress; but I do not forget that Thomas Jefferson declared that "agriculture is the most useful of the occupations of men," and that the central idea of his whole economic and political philosophy was to see every citizen, if possible, in possession of a home. He knew that under such conditions the Republic was safer than when guarded by armies or protected by navies. I do not forget that the crowning virtue of this marvelous and many-sided man was faith in the integrity and honesty of the common citizen. He was the greatest reformer of his age, but he was unfamiliar with the modern idea of Phariseeism, that everybody is a thief except the reformer himself. He held to the greater and sounder principle that all true reforms begin with the faith that the vast majority of the men are honest and that the honest ought not to be vicariously hunted down and ostracized because some have gone wrong. Do you now profess to the precepts of Jefferson and practice the principles of Buchanan? Are you willing to legislate upon the theory that your fellow citizens of the West are honest, law-abiding citizens, seeking to build up a great empire of wealth out of what before was worthless, or do you propose to continue longer in the heartless and shortsighted policy which is driving hundreds of thousands of our best people into Canada?

Mr. President, one of the common charges against the West is that her people are opposed to conservation. In answer to this charge, I invite all men to the consideration of her laws. Take my own State as an illustration. I challenge any man on this floor or elsewhere to advise of any flaw in our laws relative to the acquisition or use of water, either for power purposes or for irrigation or domestic use. No professional conservationist has ever approached in practical wisdom these laws. And no professional conservationist that I have yet found seemed to know that they were in existence. With that practical application of their experience and wisdom which is characteristic of the men who have built up that country they have dedicated the waters of our streams to the public use and made it impossible for any man to monopolize it through acquisition of title. This was all done long before those who are now criticizing us began the promulgation of their doctrine. I have the laws here, but I can not trespass upon your time to read them. The only semblance of power monopoly in our State is just now beginning to appear, made possible by the Government's withdrawing of power sites not now in private ownership, leaving those who have title masters of the situation because no one else can acquire a site. And the only protection the people of the State have against the situation comes alone from the laws enacted or to be enacted by our own people to fix rates and thus prevent extortion. The National Government with its swarm of special agents and special philosophers—these "wise men of the East"—are powerless to protect the people against a condition which they alone are bringing upon us.

Now, Mr. President, we know the worth of our natural resources; we are opposed to their being controlled by monopolists. We have done all that has been done in our part of the country to prevent it. We have not succeeded in every particular, but we have done exceedingly well and we have done all that has been done. We will do all that will be done. Moreover, we know that there is no place where monopolists finally have their way and get what they want to such an extent as in these bureaus at Washington. Here is the breeding ground for fraud. Here in these bureaus is where these scandals begin; here is where they had to begin. Here is where they first purchased favors and corrupted employees. Have we not seen great corporations come here within the last few years and trade their utterly worthless lands upon the tops of bald mountains for the richest lands in the valley below, and to the extent of millions of acres?

Mr. President, if these men who follow conservation as a profession will stop agitating and go to thinking, they may yet prove great benefactors to their kind. They may find some way to dispose of the vast amount of timber which each year falls and rots or periodically burns, so the people can have the benefit of these forests. They may find some way to open up the coal mines in Alaska so as to give the people of the Pacific slope relief from the high prices paid to eastern coal companies and the necessarily high freight for hauling. They may come to the conclusion that the development of a water power is like discovering an inexhaustible coal mine or an inexhaustible forest, for it saves both coal and timber. They may discover further that power does not wear out. That so long as the snows fall and the rains come and travel on to the sea, which, fortunately, these people can not control or they would stop, these water powers will be here and will be worth just as much a thousand years from now as they are to-day. They may discover that title has nothing to do with monopoly and that if we are to control monopoly and protect the people from extortion it must be done by some other method than that of title. They may find that idleness and nonuse can not help the people. They may conclude that these arid lands belong to the man of limited means who wants a home and who is willing to expend the energy necessary to get the home, and that a law which is harsh and unjust serves the rich and not the poor. And above all they may finally discover, and methinks I see now their bewilderment, the surprised, and astonished features of those "just men made perfect" as the light steals cautiously over their doubtful countenances—they may discover, I say, that these brave, home-loving, empire-building people who have conquered the desert and the mountains, who have "mingled the eagles of America with the eagles of the crags" are blood of their blood and flesh of their flesh, imbued with honesty as well as courage, consecrated to the rearing of families and building up of communities and making homes and laying strong and firm the foundations of great Commonwealths. When they learn these things and join us in such a conception of affairs, we will make conservation serviceable to the people in deed and in truth. But so long as they propose to serve in the end those who do not need service or who lock up in idleness and inactivity the resources which Nature's God has given us, we will fight every inch of the ground.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I simply desire to make this statement: I sympathize with the sentiments of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], but I have to confess to the Senate that the people of the West seem to desire that the administration under which these resources were bottled up and tied up and under which are the burdens with which we are now oppressed shall be reinstated and continued.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, permit me to say that there is not a withdrawal in the State of Idaho to-day of coal land or of power site or phosphate that does not bear the name of the present President of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not understand the fact to be as stated by the Senator. As I remember the history of the withdrawals in the State of Idaho, they were made by our former President.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not mistaken. It has nothing to do with this controversy at all; it is wholly aside from the proposition; but the present President of the United States rewithdrew everything of the class I have mentioned that the previous President had withdrawn.

Mr. SMOOT. I was speaking of the withdrawals, because the Senator will remember when the bill was passed preventing any further withdrawals of lands for forestry purposes in Idaho, Wyoming, Washington, Colorado, and one or two other States there was a wholesale withdrawal of the lands in those States, and they were added to the forest reserves.

I will admit this—and I do not want to discuss the question any further than just to give what I understand is the history of it—it is true that after the general withdrawal act that was passed in June, 1910, President Taft made a withdrawal order covering all the lands that had been previously withdrawn; that is, they were withdrawn under the law that was passed in June, 1910. But the Senator does not for a minute claim that President Taft has withdrawn or added one acre to the forest reserves in Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I said nothing about forest reserves. I said coal lands, the power site, and those things were all rewithdrawn by the President.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the general withdrawal order covering all the withdrawals that had been made.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely.

Mr. NEWLANDS obtained the floor.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think this matter should be explicitly stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not know that the Senator from Nevada had the floor. I only rose to state the status of those withdrawals. It is only fair to make the record state the facts. The withdrawals in many cases had been made without any authority. Prior to the withdrawal act the President had no authority to make withdrawals, the Constitution having placed that power entirely with Congress. After hammering at them for several years we finally brought them to a realization of the fact that they had been acting in violation of the law in attempting to make withdrawals; and coming to a realization of that fact Congress passed an act substantially permitting the withdrawals, and they immediately got under the shelter of that provision.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words, not of a controversial character, but simply with a view to relieving the West by proper legislation from the existing deadlock. Many years ago I felt that this deadlock was approaching, and in a speech some six or eight years ago entitled "Our misfit land laws" I sought to impress western men with the fact that unless we got together and shaped a code of land laws adapted to our economic requirements the deadlock from which we are now suffering would doubtless ensue.

I urged then that we should act with reference to the land laws just as we acted with reference to the irrigation question. We had been conducting for years in both branches of Congress a desultory debate regarding the irrigation question and we had succeeded in impressing the entire country with the importance of that question as a national question. When we had so educated both the Congress and the people of the United States as to put them in a frame of mind for full and complete legislation we found that we were divided among ourselves as to what that legislation should be. Some of us believed in a grant of the arid lands to the States; some believed in national aid, to be administered by the States; some believed in a national movement, the Government advancing the funds and obtaining recompense by the sale of the reclaimed lands.

We also differed as to where the projects should be located, the representatives of each State, of course, preferring their individual States. We found in our differences among ourselves that we were discrediting the irrigation cause. So we came together, the representatives of the 17 arid and semiarid States and Territories, and we organized a committee of 17, composed of one member from each State. The result was that we harmonized our views and presented a measure to Congress which received the approval of Congress and under which we have steadily advanced toward the completion of the reclamation projects.

Now, Mr. President, the conservation movement has not arisen from any desire to block the settlement of the West. It has not arisen in the minds of any of its most enthusiastic supporters from a desire to delay, annoy, or irritate settlers in securing homes. The whole purpose of this movement was to arrest a tendency in the direction of monopolistic control of the natural resources in coal, in timber, and in water power. It was the declared purpose of the men who were advancing this movement to save the public domain for home seekers and to protect the domain upon which they were to make their homes from monopolistic control.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to make a very brief statement, I will say to the Senator from Idaho, and the hour is late.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will defer what I was going to say. We will have the matter up to-morrow.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to conclude a very brief statement now.

Mr President, what was the tendency of this monopolistic control? First, the acquisition of great areas of timber under bad laws or under bad administration. Second, the acquisition of the control of vast areas of land used for agricultural and grazing purposes against the spirit of our laws. That tendency was manifested in numerous instances. In one instance one firm acquired a million acres in our western region, a considerable portion of it devoted to agriculture and the rest to grazing. Then there was the control that was gradually being acquired of vast areas of coal entered under laws which permitted the entry of only 160 acres by any one individual and which prevented any combination of entries. So the sentiment of the country demanded a halt, not with a view to injuring the settler, the home seeker, but with a view to preventing this monopolistic movement.

Now, that was the time for us to have suited our laws to the economic development of the West. Western men have never yet met in a conference regarding the public-land laws with a view, as they did upon the irrigation question, of harmonizing their opinions in such a way as to secure legislative action.

I bear witness to the uniform friendliness of eastern men, such men as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], to western interests. They have been willing to stand with us and by us in every effort to promote the development of the West.

Mr. President, I am not an extreme conservationist. I do not believe that the public domain is an asset of the National Government. I believe that the public domain is held in trust by the Nation for the people who are living in those States and the people who are to live there, and that any citizen of the United States can become a beneficiary of that trust by removing to the States within which the public domain exists.

I believe that ultimately the true solution of this question is to turn over the public domain to the States in which it exists under legislation that will promote settlement and restrain monopoly and monopolistic tendency. But I do not believe it is always wise to turn over an estate to a weak beneficiary, too weak to take charge of the property that is ultimately to be his. Hence, I would carefully guard the turning over of this domain to the States within which it exists.

We have realized that with reference to the swamp lands which were turned over by the National Government to the various States. Many of them had not the financial strength or experience necessary to cope with that subject, and we find now that almost every State in which swamp lands exist, having improvidently parted with the title of the lands, is now coming to the National Government for a full, complete, and comprehensive plan relating to their development in connection with navigation as the sole present source of national power, thus confessing that the grant itself was an improvident one.

I should regard the present grant of all the lands that are capable of irrigation to the various States as improvident because most of the rivers are interstate rivers; they involve interstate problems and require the action of a sovereignty whose jurisdiction exists over every inch of American soil and whose sovereignty is not confined within a detached portion of a region tributary to a certain river.

But all our legislation should gradually tend to turning over this great domain to the control of the States within which it is located.

Mr. President, the settlement of the humid region was a comparatively simple one. The agricultural homestead meant there but one thing, and that was 160 acres of land capable of being cultivated, and there was no difficulty about cultivating it. But as we go west we find the difficulty increasing. As a result we have been obliged from time to time to change the law regarding homesteads, and we have not only the agricultural homestead which may exist and ought to exist only in the humid region, but we have the dry-farming homestead, the enlarged homestead, and we have the reclamation homestead under the reclamation act.

Then, outside of the land that is capable of irrigation we have vast areas devoted to grazing, and the question is whether we shall so administrate that grazing domain as to turn it over to a few cattle barons or whether we shall have a grazing homestead of some kind, large enough to support individual families, and give to each family the control not of 160 acres, not of 320 acres, or of 640 acres, but of enough land to graze enough cattle to support a family. That amount may range all the way from 5,000 acres to 15,000 acres. Then the question will be as to whether we shall give the title absolutely or whether we shall simply give grazing permits for a limited number of years, holding the lands in such a position as that hereafter, with the progress of irrigation, those lands can be divided and turned into agricultural homesteads.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield to the Senator, but I wish to say that I only desire to make a very brief statement.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will not interrupt the Senator for more than a minute. It is true now that in the extreme Southwest all of the habitable land is either taken up by private settlement or reserved by Indian reservations or by forest reservations. The land left is desert land. They have now undertaken to prevent the settlement or location, if you please, of any spring or water hole. How are you going to raise cattle in that country if you put a limitation on the title or on the right to graze, or if you merely lease the land for a season? Who is going into the cattle business and subject his lease to the ideas of any particular head of department who happens to hold an accidental position here? What do you want to reserve the great desert lands for, except for grazing purposes? If you give title, what will prevent the man having the most cattle getting title to the land, thus leaving the matter in worse condition than it is to-day?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I do not propose to endeavor in a brief speech to solve all of these questions. I am simply stating them. What I urge is that the representatives of these 17 States should get together in conference and appoint a committee with a view to recommending to Congress a code of laws upon this subject; that consider the question as to whether absolute title should be given to these grazing areas in large units, from 5,000 to 15,000 acres—enough to support a family—or whether they will retain the title, simply giving grazing permits for a period of years, with a possibility hereafter that these lands may come under some irrigation project not now in contemplation.

Mr. President, regarding the timber lands, we all know the extensive monopolies which have been created. Our laws never intended them, and yet we have drifted into a condition under which a million acres of timber land are owned by one man. We ought to take up this matter and adjust it in such a way as will secure the development of our natural resources in our entire country without involving monopolistic control.

If there are faults in administration and they can be corrected by legislation, we should enact the legislation which will correct them; but that is not to be accomplished by desultory debates on the floor of the Senate and on the floor of the other House, arraigning well-intentioned men in the country who have simply sought not to absorb this great asset for the East or for the Nation, but to protect it for home seekers of the present day and the home seekers of the future.

What reservations is it sought to make? It is sought to reserve the timber and substitute a sale of stumpage for a sale of the land itself. There is no reason why that stumpage should be made a matter of revenue to the National Government; it ought not to be, because the more you charge for the stumpage, the greater you make the price of the timber itself to the ultimate consumer. There should be, however, some charge to cover the expense of administration, and of the charge that is made, the bulk of it should be turned over to the States in which the timber exists to supply the place of the taxes which would be imposed upon the land if it were in private ownership.

So also with reference to oil and coal, we should either classify these lands and then reserve them, permit their development under liberal laws providing for a royalty system, or else we should provide for the entry of the entire surface for agricultural or grazing purposes, reserving to the Government any future discoveries of coal or oil or phosphate. The latter is what the Government of Canada has done under the inspiration of this conservation movement; and yet some of our western friends say, "Oh, no; when you grant a homestead you must grant title from the heavens above to the center of the earth below," losing sight of the fact that whilst they insist we are driving the settlers to Canada, those settlers are there gladly accepting homesteads that give title neither to the roof of heaven nor to the depths below, but which give title only to the surface for agriculture, the mineral, the timber, and the water power locations being reserved.

Then there is another element, that of water power. We all know that hydroelectric power is entering more into the daily life of our people than any other element; we know the tendency toward its monopolistic control; we know that a great movement is now projected which will involve the utilization of our rivers for every purpose, including tributaries and source streams, and that this comprehensive plan involves not only the improvement of rivers for navigation, but for every useful purpose under a system of cooperation between the Nation and the States, under which each of them will do its work and pay its proportion of the cost that belongs to its jurisdiction.

Now, what is suggested under this conservation movement? Simply that the water-power sites should not go with the grant; that, whilst a man may make an agricultural entry which covers a power site, yet the title to that power site, if it is hereafter developed to be useful as such, shall not pass. The law can be shaped in such a way as to give the owner of that property, the entryman, proper compensation for his improvements. It is not the purpose of the conservation movement to wrong any man, to wrong the entryman who has made an agricultural entry upon a water-power site, but simply to prevent him from holding up the country, holding up the community, and wronging the people at large.

I do not pretend to say what law should be passed upon these questions. Time does not permit; but it seems to me that the rational way to proceed is for the Members from the West to confer together, appoint a committee, adjust this question, and present it to Congress for its approval. I assume that the Members from the West are not opposed to a wise conservation policy; that if they do object to a reservation to the Nation, they will not object to a reservation to their respective States; and, if it is necessary, we can so shape these laws as to make the reservation of the water power, the coal, and the oil run to the States in which these natural resources are located, instead of to the Nation. I assume that any rational conservationist in the country will be satisfied if such natural resources are reserved to the public rather than granted to monopolistic corporations.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has referred to the fact that the homestead bill is in conference. It is in conference under an understanding in the House of Representatives when it went to conference that the question of the reservation of minerals, water power, and timber should be considered. We have been considering them, and as they involve almost the entire conservation question necessarily a good deal of time has been taken up.

I will say for the Secretary of the Interior that, whilst he is not as familiar, perhaps, with the West as are many of us, I am convinced that his desire is the real advancement and development of the West. He is desirous of doing away with the army of special agents who are now called upon under existing law to classify the public lands, to determine what is coal, what is water power, and what is oil land, a process that will necessarily take a great deal of time and that involves vexation to the settler. He would like to save vexation upon this subject by adopting the Canadian law, which is held up to our approval here, and he says that if that is adopted and grants of homesteads are made simply to the surface, reserving the mineral below and the timber and the water power, as the Canadian law does, then settlement upon the land will be comparatively easy, the army of special agents will be dismissed, and settlement can go on with the absolute assurance that the future discovery of water-power sites or coal or oil will be in the interest of all the people, rather than in favor of special interests.

I hope that we shall come to some conclusion within a short time, but we shall come to no satisfactory conclusion until the men of the West meet together, as they did upon the irrigation question, and present a solution of this entire subject.

Mr. BURNHAM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 15, 1912, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 14, 1912.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven cleanse us, we beseech Thee, from all unrighteousness, and fill our hearts with the Christ spirit, that we may think clearly, speak wisely, and act nobly in all the duties pertaining to the hour. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

APPEAL FROM DEPARTMENT REGULATIONS OF PUBLIC DOMAIN.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for half a minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to address the House for half a minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to insert in the RECORD a speech delivered before the public lands convention held at Denver Colo., September 28 to October 3, 1911, on the right of appeal to the courts from the decisions of the department in relation to the public domain, namely, "The demand for access to the courts upon all questions arising from department regulations pertaining to the public domain."

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it a speech by the gentleman himself?

Mr. RAKER. No.

Mr. BARTLETT. Whose speech is it?

Mr. RAKER. It is a speech delivered at Denver by Mr. Lane.

The SPEAKER. Of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. RAKER. No; Mr. E. A. Lane, of California.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to object, but I want to say that it occurs to me that printing speeches in the RECORD indiscriminately for distribution has been carried to an extreme degree. There has been considerable criticism of it in the public press, and I fear justly so. The printing of indiscriminate speeches of gentlemen much distinguished, and others not quite so distinguished, for the purpose of using the franking privilege to distribute the speeches is a practice not to be encouraged. I am not going to object to my friend's request this time, but I think that hereafter, unless it is a very important matter, and is a speech from some very prominent Member of either House, or some man who has occupied some distinguished position to whom attention has been attracted, that I shall object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the speech referred to:

[Speech of Mr. E. A. Lane, of California, at the Public Lands Convention, at Denver, Colo., Sept. 28 to Oct. 3, 1911.]

THE DEMAND FOR ACCESS TO THE COURTS UPON ALL QUESTIONS ARISING FROM DEPARTMENT REGULATIONS PERTAINING TO THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

"Mr. Chairman, delegates, ladies, and gentlemen: Elbert Hubbard, in speaking of the legal profession, has said that one-half of the lawyers are hanging onto the coat tails of the business community, while the other half are throwing banana peelings under the wheels of progress. Martin Luther, speaking on the same topic, said:

"Lawyers commonly dispute about words. They alter the facts and fall to go to the bottom of them that the truth may be discovered. They take the money of the poor and with their tongues thrash out both their pockets and their purses. They make poor Christians, and few of them shall be saved.

"According, therefore, to generally accepted authority, ancient as well as modern, this present subject of demand for access to the courts in public-land cases would be deemed of very little importance by the people at large or by this convention if it affected only the welfare of the lawyers. As a measure for the conservation of litigation, undoubtedly, it would not be popular. However, this subject is not one for the conservation of litigation. It is a subject which affects vitally the welfare of the homestead claimant, of the irrigator, of the miner and prospector, of the right-of-way applicant, of the grazer, and of every settler on or near public lands or public reservations.

"In looking over the list of subjects to be discussed at this convention, it occurred to me immediately that this present subject of demand for access to the courts in public-land matters is one upon which all possible factions should be practically unanimous; there should be no conflict nor any division along the lines of so-called conservation or anticonservation. To open the courts of justice to individual suitors who consider themselves to be adversely affected or illegally damaged by some decision, or by the enforcement of some rule or regulation, in public-land cases can not in any respect be considered a step antagonistic to any governmental policy. It can no more be considered a step against the Forest Service, or against the policy of reserving or leasing mineral lands and water-power sites, than could the allowance of access to the courts in customs cases be considered as a step in favor of free trade. Whatever Government policy may be adopted touching the public lands, surely all of us can agree upon the fundamental principle that that policy must be a legal one, in harmony with the Constitution and authorized by Congress. It is by this legal sanction that the protective tariff laws were established, and no one is in any way apprehensive that the Government's policy in that direction will be jeopardized or defeated because a means has been provided by which disputes in customs cases may be adjudicated.

"There may be some few individuals, of warped or distorted mentality or of disposition incompatible with free constitutional government, who have no confidence in human integrity, no faith in or respect for the courts, and no patience with any legal restraints or limitations which happen to run contrary to their own individual ideas of propriety or public policy. But such individuals are not conservatonists; they are anarchists. They are not accounted desirable citizens any more by the most enthusiastic believers in Government ownership and control than by the advocates of local State control over the public lands. It is not due to people of that peculiar stamp of immorality, but entirely owing to their successful submersion, that our form of government now exists and that courts of justice have been established. Certainly it is not to such individuals that any word here spoken is addressed. Courts of justice, and particularly the courts of our own country, have been found to be the most faithful friends and firmest protectors of individuals and their rights and privileges, but they have also with equal firmness protected and upheld regularity, stability, and efficiency in the lawful administration of government functions.

"I think that no one will deny that the present status of the law with reference to land claimants who seek access to the courts, or who are haled into court as defendants and opposed by Government officers, is indefensible. The doors of the courts, so far as concerns any practical means of access or measure of protection, are securely barred against public-land claimants. For the purpose of illustrating the illogical and unjustifiable extreme to which the rule has been extended, I wish to cite a case which came under my personal observation while I was district law officer of the Federal Forest Service at San Francisco. I desire first to state, however, that this case is not cited in criticism of the Forest Service. Under the law and the decisions of the courts, the Government officials had the defendant entirely under their personal power. By their personal clemency and leniency, but not by the law, he was protected.

"The case to which I refer was one of a suit by the Government against Mr. Harold T. Power, a resident of California, who is very well and favorably known; not a multimillionaire nor a timber baron. He had purchased in good faith from the Central Pacific Railroad Co. a quarter section—160 acres—of surveyed timberland. No patent to the land had been issued or even sought, because, under the terms of the railroad company's grant, Mr. Power's title to the land, even without patent, was absolute and complete, legally as well as equitably, provided only that the land was in fact nonmineral in character. In other words, the railroad company's legal title to all nonmineral land within its described area had become perfect and complete as a present grant from the Government immediately upon legal identification by survey, regardless of and independent of any action to be taken by the officials of the Land Department. This was conceded by the Government itself under the terms of the act of Congress. On the other hand, if the land was in fact mineral in character, it still belonged to the Government.

"The public-land surveyors in running the section and township lines had reported generally that this and other surrounding land was mineral, while a geologist of the Geological Survey, after a careful examination of the particular tract in question, had reported it nonmineral. The Government, however, filed suit against Mr. Power for some $2,000 for having cut timber on this land. In answer to the Government suit, he alleged that he had purchased the land, and offered to prove that the land was in fact nonmineral, and that therefore he had perfect title and was the legal owner of the timber. The court, however, sustained the Government's demurrer to Mr. Power's answer, and decided that, even though the land was in fact nonmineral, nevertheless the court could not allow the defendant to prove that fact. Mr. Power had been haled into court at the suit of the Government. His one possible defense lay in his proving that the land was nonmineral in character. With this proof he could legally establish his title; without it he must pay to the Government $2,000 for timber cut by him from his own land. Nevertheless, the court decided that it was powerless to afford him any relief. The court held that the Secretary of the interior, and the Secretary of the Interior alone, not the courts, possessed jurisdiction to hear and determine the evidence offered.

"This decision, unreasonable and unjust as it was, was strictly in accord with the law. It was so obvious, however, that the defendant was denied any opportunity for a fair hearing or for just relief that the officials of the Forest Service refused to proceed further with their prosecution. Nevertheless it was entirely possible under the law for them, simply because they were Government officials, to carry the case to judgment and to collect from Mr. Power $2,000, denying him meanwhile any opportunity of presenting before the court the very evidence necessary to his defense.

"The decision of the court in this Harold T. Power case was not only in accord with, but is also a very good illustration of, the present status of the law. And, strangely enough, this remarkable denial of access to the courts and of the protection of the courts to public-land claimants is not the result of any specific legislation. Congress has merely failed and neglected to legislate either one way or the other, and under this total lack of legislative direction the courts have, by their decisions, gradually reversed their former rules of practice. Formerly, under the decisions of the Supreme Court, the district court at San Francisco could not have denied to Mr. Power the opportunity which he asked to present evidence for the protection of his title against the suit of the Government officers. In two cases decided by the United States Supreme Court, one in 1870 and one in 1887, that court expressly held that the local courts should receive and consider and pass upon the evidence offered by public-land claimants in support of their title. By reason of the similarity, both in principles of law and in the nature of their facts, these two cases, although admitting of slight legal distinctions, are very closely analogous to the Harold T. Power case. In these two instances the grantee was a State instead of a railroad corporation, but, like the grant to the railroad corporation, the grant to the State took effect and vested legal title in the grantee in advance of and regardless of any official action by the Land Department.

"In the first of these two cases—the case of Railroad Co. v. Smith (76 U. S., 94)—the court said:

> "The right of the State did not depend upon his [the Secretary of the Interior] action, but on the act of Congress. * * * As that officer had no satisfactory evidence under his control * * * he must rely, as he did in many cases, on witnesses whose personal knowledge enabled them to report as to the character of the tracts claimed. * * * Why should not the same kind of testimony, subject to cross-examination, be competent when the issue is raised in a court of justice? * * * We are of opinion that the State court did not err in that [the admission of verbal testimony].

"This case, you will notice, not only held that the courts of justice had jurisdiction to receive and pass upon evidence, but gave cogent reasons upholding the propriety and duty of the courts in this regard.

"In the other case—Wright v. Roseberry (121 U. S., 488)—the Supreme Court said:

> "For the error in holding that the certificate of the commissioner was necessary to pass the title of the demanded premises to the State the case must go back for a new trial, when the parties will be at liberty to show whether or not the lands in controversy were in fact swamp and overflowed * * *. If they are proved to have been such * * * they were not afterwards subject to preemption by settlers.

"You will notice that in this last case, under the express direction of the United States Supreme Court, the parties were given liberty to introduce evidence in the lower court. The contrast between these two earlier cases and the recently decided Power case shows an obvious reversal of policy and of practice by the courts. This change, as above stated, has not been due to any action, but rather to inertia and inaction on the part of Congress.

"As showing, however, that such change adverse to public-land claimants has been definitely adopted by the United States Supreme Court, I wish to quote from the recent case of the Riverside Oil Co. v. former Secretary of the Interior Hitchcock, reported in volume 190, United States Reports, page 316. The court said:

"* * * The head of an executive department * * * must exercise his judgment in expounding the laws and resolution of Congress under which he is from time to time required to act.

"* * * Whether he decided right or wrong is not the question. Having jurisdiction to decide at all, he had necessarily jurisdiction, and it was his duty to decide as he thought the law was, and the courts have no power whatever under those circumstances to review his determination by mandamus or injunction. * * * Nor does the fact that no writ of error will lie in such a case by which to review the judgment of the Secretary furnish any foundation for the claim that mandamus may therefore be awarded. The responsibility as well as the power rests with the Secretary, uncontrolled by the courts.

"It is interesting to note that at the date of this decision the statutory powers and duties of the Secretary of the Interior in public-land matters were identically the same as at the date of the decision in the case of Wright v. Roseberry, previously referred to, in which the Supreme Court expressly directed that evidence should be introduced before, and the facts there determined by, the trial court.

"Of course, these few cases here cited do not cover every detail nor every point of technical distinction that might be called to attention in a court of law. There are, however, a great number of cases which raise and dispose of almost every conceivable point that could be suggested in the interest of any public-land claimant, and the Supreme Court has resolved practically all of them in such a way as to bar the public-land claimant from access to courts. There are, it is true, three classes of exceptions to the rule, but these afford only limited and qualified relief. They are found, first, in mineral-land cases; second, where the claimant is defendant; and, third, where the land has been patented.

"First, under the mining laws, section 2326 of the United States Revised Statutes has for many years permitted free access to the courts in cases of private adverse claims. Disputes have been settled, the scope and effect of the mining laws determined, and private property rights adequately protected. Unfortunately there is no similar provision for agricultural claimants, or covering contests and adverse recommendations by Government officials against any character of claims.

"The second means of access to the courts referred to is by the claimant being haled into court at the suit of the Government. As seen in the Harold T. Power case (which was the first case I referred to), even then the claimant may be defenseless. In some few cases, involving rights of way and grazing regulations, the claimant has been brought into court upon the Government's suit for injunction. This remedy is not adequate, nor is it practicable except in comparatively rare instances.

"The third exception mentioned is in agricultural-land cases. A claimant who has been illegally deprived of his land by wrongful action of the land officers has the privilege of waiting until the land has been patented to some other person, and then file a suit in equity against that person to have him declared trustee of the land. There are many cases of this character in the books. A typical one is that of Ard v. Brandon, 156 U. S., 537, where the court said:

"He [the plaintiff in the suit] did all that was in his power in the first instance to secure the land as his homestead. That he failed was not his fault; it came through the wrongful action of one of the officers of the Government. * * * Here a rightful application was wrongfully rejected. * * *

"And again:

"Such wrongful rejection did not operate to deprive the defendant of his equitable rights. * * * If he does all that the statute prescribes as the condition of acquiring rights, the law protects him in those rights.

"The language in that case declaring the rule of adequate protection sounds reassuring. No suit in such cases can, however, be instituted until the Government has parted with its title. Ten, twenty, and thirty years ago it was the policy of the Land Department to patent the public lands as speedily as possible, and there were, practically speaking, no Government contests and no reserved or withdrawn areas. Even then this partial remedy was little better than a denial of justice, since a rightful claimant could be, and many times was, illegally deprived of the use and possession of his land, and forced to wait 5 or perhaps 10 years, until his adversary had secured Government patent, before he could even begin the necessarily expensive and cumbersome litigation. At the present time, moreover, the policy of the Government to make withdrawals and reservations has placed from one-fourth to three-fifths of the total area of many public-land States permanently, or for an indefinite period, beyond the possibility of being patented, and this remedy, unsatisfactory as it always was, is therefore now to that extent not available. In fact, this remedy is now generally recognized as of no practical value and is seldom invoked. It furthermore never did afford any relief, nor is there any other remedy available in cases where the claimant is directly opposed by the Government officers. As a matter of natural consequence, unavoidable under the present system, it may be added also that the greater number of instances of injustice and hardship of late years have occurred where claimants have been opposed by Government officials. It certainly can not fail to impress any impartial mind as being indeed most remarkable that in those particular cases where a claimant's asserted rights are considered by the executive department to be adverse to the interests of some one of its own projects or policies or bureaus, that in such cases, of all others, the claimant must be left entirely in the hands of that department, without the least possibility of any appeal or review elsewhere. Impartial judgment is humanly impossible where adversary and judge are one, no matter what may be the conscientious piety of that one.

"That the present system of absolute and uncontrolled executive power over public-land matters is indefensible in principle I think no one will deny. It is not necessary to cite Montesquieu's "Spirit of the Laws" or Alexander Hamilton's "Federalist Essays" or other authority; we all know that it is fundamentally un-American and contrary to every principle of our form of government to close the courts against relief or redress for violations of valuable legal rights. Two or three sentences may well be quoted, however, from the famous case of Marbury against Secretary of State James Madison, which was recently referred to by President Taft as one of the cornerstones of our Government. That case involved the violation of an individual citizen's property rights by the Secretary of a department. It is the oldest and strongest precedent in support of the protection of the individual against illegal executive action. The court said:

"The very essence of civil liberty certainly consists in the right of every individual to claim the protection of the laws whenever he receives an injury. One of the first duties of the Government is to afford that protection.

"It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is.

"It is a general and indisputable rule that where there is a legal right there is also a legal remedy by suit, or action at law, whenever that right is invaded.

"The principle, there so forcibly announced, of assurance to individual citizens of the willing protection of the courts should effectively operate in public-land cases above all others. It has always seemed to me that, of all citizens in civil life who are entitled to the full benefit of every safeguard and protection the law can offer, the one first in order should be the public-land claimant in his assertion of claim to the meager property rights he may obtain. He may in some instances have prospered and spread himself as did the wicked man referred to in the Psalms; but, as a rule, his has been and to-day is a hard lot, with struggle and hardship and with very little reward except the satisfaction of having sown where others shall reap. The pioneer in the larger business enterprises upon the public lands does not stand under the same halo of peculiar sympathetic personal interest as does the individual settler, but at the same time his enterprise and courage and initiative are far above the ordinary in public value. Certainly he does not merit any denial of common justice or to have closed against him the legal protection commonly accorded to the pawnbroker and the loan shark.

"No impelling cause or sound reason ever has been given for the present denial of judicial relief. The only justification ever suggested by the courts for closing their doors to the public-land claimant is that the land department has been constituted a special tribunal with judicial functions for his protection. That does not seem to justify the present complete denial of the courts to land claimants, because, as we have already seen, that department was not considered to be so sacredly judicial in 1887, when the case of Wright v. Roseberry was decided. The courts afforded at least a more liberal measure of relief at that time, and no legislation has been enacted since then requiring any change in the practice of the courts.

"Furthermore, there exists now much keener necessity for liberal access to the courts in land cases than ever before. In former years the Land Department maintained a far more judicial attitude than it does at the present time. Peculiarly enough, during the very period while the doors of the courts have been closing tighter and tighter against land claimants, influences have been at work causing the Land Department to become less and less judicial and more and more distinctly executive in its attitude and administration. As previously mentioned, we know that in former decades the controlling policy of the Land Department was to patent the public lands as rapidly as possible. There were few contests instituted by the Government officers and practically no reserved or withdrawn areas. At that time the chief function of the officers of the department was to sit in judgment upon conflicting private claims concerning which they had cause to feel only the desire and promptings of an impartial and wholly dispassionate judge. The sense of purely judicial obligation and duty was, naturally enough, developed and fostered among them by the fact that these classes of cases predominated in their work, and the prevailing attitude of the department was therefore conscientiously judicial. To this situation it was due no doubt, in a large degree, that even in those cases where there was no private contest and the issues involved were solely between the Government and the private applicant, the officials at that time were, as a general rule, more keenly sensitive to the binding obligation resting upon the judge to determine impartially whether the applicant had or had not complied with the law and become entitled legally to the property or legal rights applied for. There was not then, as, unfortunately, there is at the present time, a general disposition among the departmental subordinates to adopt the now current sophistry which argues that the department, if in its own opinion the public good will be subserved thereby, may reject private claims, even though the applicant has admittedly done 'all that the statute prescribes as the condition for acquiring' the rights sought. In former years general recognition and respect was willingly accorded to the language which the Supreme Court used in the case of Frisbie v. Whitney (76 U. S., 668) that the land officers have no legal authority to refuse 'rights, however inchoate, which are protected by laws still in existence,' and to the declaration of the Supreme Court in the case of Cornelius v. Kessel (128 U. S., 456), which says, concerning the Land Department, that its—

"power of supervision and correction is not an unlimited or an arbitrary power. It can be exerted only when the entry was made upon false testimony or without authority of law. It can not be exercised so as to deprive a person of land lawfully entered.

"In considering the greater need of access to the courts now than in former years it should also be remembered that the forest reservations now cover nearly 200,000,000 acres and that within this tremendous domain are property rights and private claims equal in number and in importance to the total private property in some of the States. The Forest Service has practically no established system of notice or for giving opportunity for hearings and maintains no regularity or judicial character to its proceedings in adjudicating private rights. In most instances it acts ex parte upon reports and information kept strictly confidential in its own files. It is at the present time administering a large number of important land laws and an accumulated mass of departmental regulations under which private rights and property claims are determined (you can not say adjudicated) in the cheerful and summary and unceremonious manner of a black negro mammy spanking her many pickaninnies on a busy wash day. I say that not because I am hostile to the Forest Service, for I am not; but it is true. And it is unfortunate also for the Forest Service itself that it is true. This is a serious matter. And we must bear in mind that this bureau now acts within its own sphere with the same power of final and uncontrolled adjudication of private rights as does the Land Department.

"Another circumstance increasing the present need for access to the courts is the fact that the number of statutes and departmental regulations thereunder has increased. The executive officials are now confronted by a bewildering legal tangle of laws and regulations, many of them inconsistent with each other and some of them inconsistent in their own terms. Other statutes are fragmentary or antiquated. The situation is a difficult and embarrassing one even for administration. For judicial interpretation and construction we should certainly have access to a court or courts of recognized standing.

"It might be well to consider a very few of the circumstances attending the administration of the executive departments, from whose decisions the public-land claimant now has no appeal or possibility of relief. I think that no thoughtful student of the principles and historical development of our institutions will deny that the distinctive characteristic of executive bureaus and departments should properly be vigorous activity along the lines of their own selected or adopted policies. These policies will change from time to time with changing administrations and political variations. Even under the most complete system of civil service the changing of Secretaries and of policies will bring about all-pervading changes in attitude throughout the department. Civil service may limit the freedom of but it can by no means prevent the exercise of influence by the Secretary over his subordinates. Even though he encourages personal independence, the Secretary's influence is and always will be controlling.

"The Secretary and those in authority under him always have free power of promotion and demotion, and of transfer from certain positions to other positions, and of change from certain duties to others more or less advantageous; and the subordinates are always keenly conscious of the possibility that it may be advantageous to act in harmony with the Secretary's policy. This instability and change of policy and attitude, this trimming of sails to suit varying currents renders absolutely impossible the establishment and firm maintenance of a definite and consistent system of public-land law. In fact, the very thought of purpose or of administrative policy, or the thought of political effect—all of these ideas which are inherent in the executive departments—are in their very nature incompatible with any proper conception of a judicial tribunal. It is little less than criminal to leave the public-land claimant, without any hope of relief or possibility of redress, at the mercy of such a system. It is a political crime against the public-land States of the West that the property titles and legal claims, upon the security of which must depend largely the enterprise and business development of the western country, must remain subject to the judication and to the sole protection of a tribunal of this nature.

"Limited time makes it impracticable to discuss in detail, or even to cite, specific instances of hardship and injustice under the present system of exclusive departmental control. It is interesting to investigate the many suits which were brought by defeated claimants to recover land after the issuance of patent in former years when conditions were different and that remedy offered some measure of relief. A study of those cases will furnish ample evidence that the executive officers of the Land Department even in former years frequently denied individual property rights in clear violation of the law and under circumstances of great injustice. On account of the inadequacy of that remedy, as previously explained, it must be remembered also that the number of suits actually brought represents but a small proportion of the cases in which injustice was suffered even then. And no one familiar with the actual conditions of affairs in public-land administration, with the present confusing and inadequate public-land laws and with the irresistibly biasing and warping effect of recent political agitation in public-land matters, will contend that the denials of legal rights and of privileges lawfully claimed under the public-land laws are now fewer in number than they were in former years.

"I wish to give a brief quotation indicating the hardships actually attending the present administration of the public-land laws, and indicating not only the hardships to individuals, but the injustice to investors, and also the unfortunate uncertainty of, and insecurity in the protection of, legal rights, which is now seriously retarding legitimate commercial development in the public-land States. This quotation will be from a speech by Hon. JOHN E. RAKER, of California, reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 5 of this year. Judge RAKER has for years been a very prominent and successful lawyer. Before his election to Congress he was judge of one of the superior courts of the State. He is thoroughly conversant with public-land conditions and practice. His congressional district includes Government lands of large area, both within and outside of forest reservations. He is recognized as an authority upon questions of public-land law. Judge RAKER's language is of all the more interest and value because he is an accepted and thoroughly orthodox conservationist, and one of the stanchest supporters of the Federal Forest Service. His speech on July 5 was directed in favor of his own resolution calling for a thorough investigation by Congress of actual public-land conditions in the West. I shall give four excerpts from his speech:

"A great number of complaints have been coming from the citizens of all the public-land States, protesting against alleged hardship, injustice, and inequality in the operation of the public-land laws. The complaints received have not been restricted to any one class. They have come from homestead and desert-land claimants, from prospectors and the locators of mining claims, from municipalities and companies supplying power and water to municipalities, from irrigators and from irrigation companies, from operators of mines, mills, and reduction works, and from those living east as well as west who have invested in mining, irrigation, and water-power development. * * *

"Congress some six years ago enacted a statute apparently granting rights of way for reservoirs, ditches, pipe lines, tunnels, and canals for municipal, mining, milling, and ore-reduction purposes. Now complaints, serious complaints, are heard that this statute has been so stripped and whittled away by construction and application that its beneficial objects and purposes are utterly defeated. * * *

"Business investment and enterprise are discouraged and seriously retarded by the maze of doubt and uncertainty surrounding this whole general subject of rights of way across the public lands, and by the constant menace and threat of litigation if any move is made. Complaint is made repeatedly also that there is a tendency on the part of some Government agents and officers to penalize and to question the motives and integrity of those who wish to take such questions into the courts for adjudication. This is a very serious complaint and should be sifted to the bottom, especially in view of the circumstances in which honest men must find themselves in considering the legal phases of the situation. The scope and effect of many of the statutes when considered singly, and the effect of some of the later ones upon those passed previously, remain unadjudicated. Not only the scope and effect of these laws in a general sense, but even the significance of many of their most important words and phrases, remain undetermined. They refer in terms to railroads, reservoirs, canals, ditches, pipe lines, flumes, dams, highways, trails, tramways, and transmission and telegraph lines, and yet the purport and logical effect of a recent ruling by the standing master in chancery of the United States Circuit Court at San Francisco would seem to be that rights of way across the public lands of the West can no longer be secured even by irrigation companies or for transcontinental railroads. * * *

"There are many complaints lodged also by miners, homesteaders, and desert-land claimants to the effect that the practice and decisions have tended of late years to handicap needlessly and unnecessarily to annoy and harass those who have faithfully and honestly complied with the public-land laws.

"It is not, however, a fault chargeable to the departmental or bureaucratic officials that such constant complaint is everywhere made against their rulings and decisions. The fault is not with them, but with the present system. The Executive can not properly be expected to be judicial or impartial in its attitude. It is the active agent of the Government. It of right ought to be definite and vigorous, not judicial or deliberative. It is the constitutional duty of Congress promptly to enact new laws to correct any undesirable policy legally adopted by the Executive, while the duty of restraining illegal executive tendencies lies with the judiciary. This duty will be performed naturally, and in the usual and regular manner, by opening the courts to complaints of injustice and injury. The courts by declaring the true meaning, scope, and effect of the laws will uphold and support the Executive in all proper interpretation and application of the statutes.

"I understand—in fact, I think I may safely say that I am sure—that it is the personal desire of the Secretary of the Interior and of the Forester to have cleared away by definite judicial determination the many points of doubtful or disputed legality which now exist concerning the subjects under their administration. They desire to know by determinative judicial authority what they can and should do and what things can not and ought not to be done. Free access to the courts will bring authoritative determinations of private rights, will relieve the executive departments from the burden of much bitter criticism, and will bring justification and support to the lawful execution of whatever public-land policy is adopted.

"President Taft has recognized both the right and the need of access to the courts in this class of cases. On June 21 of last year he sent to Congress a special message urging early consideration of the subject. He said:

"There are, perhaps, no questions in which the public has more acute interest than those relating to the disposition of the public domain. I am just in receipt from the Secretary of the Interior of a recommendation that in disposition of important legal questions which he is called upon to decide relating to the public lands, an appeal be authorized from his decision to the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

"I fully indorse the views of the Secretary in this particular, which are set forth in his letter, transmitted herewith, and urge upon the Congress an early consideration of the subject.

"Whether the particular method suggested by the President, that of appeal to the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, is the most desirable method to adopt, or whether some other means of access to the courts should be provided, should be carefully considered and freely discussed. The chief object of the President's message, however—that of securing legislation expressly granting the right of access to the courts—should receive our hearty approval and the active support of all."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6585. An act increasing the appropriation for the extension, alteration, and improvement of the public building in the city of Concord, N. H.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 6585. An act increasing the appropriation for the extension, alteration, and improvement of the public building in the city of Concord, N. H.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 19238. An act to amend section 90 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 39. House joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution, providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

REGULATION OF INJUNCTIONS.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, is House resolution 520, which was under consideration last evening at adjournment, now before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the resolution reported by the gentleman from Texas is not a privileged resolution, that it is not in order, and that the Committee on Rules had no jurisdiction to report the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Upon what does the gentleman base his point of order?

Mr. MANN. The rule provides that—

At the expiration of such time the previous question shall be ordered on the bill and said substitute to final passage, and the House shall immediately proceed to vote on the bill and substitute without any intervening motion.

Mr. Speaker, it became the practice in the Congresses prior to the Sixty-first Congress to adopt resolutions of this kind reported from the Committee on Rules. For instance, on November 16, 1903, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] reported a resolution for the consideration of the Cuban reciprocity bill, which concluded in this language:

And whenever general debate is closed the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House, and immediately the House shall vote, without debate or intervening motion, on the engrossment and third reading and on the passage of the bill.

The question was raised at that time whether that shut out any intervening motion, and it was so ruled, although an appeal was taken and the appeal was overruled. Subsequently various other resolutions were asked from the Committee on Rules, which eliminated even the right of appeal.

Following that course, many Members of the House have come to believe that the right to offer a motion to recommit, which originally was designed to permit the gentleman in charge of the bill to move to recommit for the purpose of correcting an error in the bill—that the right to offer a motion to recommit had become a right of the minority, and there was incorporated in the rules of the Sixty-first Congress, and it is in the rules of this Congress, this provision, on page 359 of the Manual, referring to the Committee on Rules:

The Committee on Rules shall not report any rule or order which shall provide that business under paragraph 7, Rule XXIV, shall be set aside by a vote of less than two-thirds of the Members present; nor shall it report any rule or order which shall operate to prevent a motion to recommit being made, as provided in paragraph 4 of Rule XVI.

Now, this rule endeavors to cut out the motion to recommit, because it expressly provides that the House shall immediately proceed to vote on the bill and substitute without any intervening motion; while the rule provides that the Committee on Rules is not authorized to report any rule which shall operate to prevent a motion to recommit being made.

It is true that the motion to recommit is not of as great value to the minority as it was supposed to be before the ruling of the Chair the other day, but the right to offer the motion to recommit is preserved by the rules, and preserved in such a manner that the Committee on Rules can not report a rule which shuts it out. Doubtless they could report a rule which would amend the rule providing for a motion to recommit, or the Committee on Rules could report a rule eliminating the rule to recommit, but they can not report a rule which violates the rule providing for the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. Suppose this rule was adopted and there was a controversy as to whether anybody had the right to make a motion to recommit, is the gentleman from Illinois clear that this rule undertakes to cut out the motion to recommit?

Mr. MANN. I am clear that under the precedents it does. It says that it does, and under the precedents it does.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the question of the Chair to the gentleman from Illinois is pertinent, and I was about to address myself to that point. There was no intention on the part of the committee to prevent the motion to recommit, and I apprehend that there will be no objection made to a motion of that kind on this side of the House.

But let me suggest several thoughts. It is true the House amended the rules of the House to read that the Committee on Rules shall not report any rule or order which shall operate to prevent a motion to recommit being made as provided in paragraph 4 of Rule XVI.

Paragraph 4 of Rule XVI reads:

After the previous question shall have been ordered on the passage of a bill or joint resolution, one motion to recommit shall be in order, and the Speaker shall give preference in recognition to such Member who is opposed to the bill or joint resolution.

Mr. Speaker, while it is true the Committee on Rules has been forbidden to report a rule that would deny a motion to recommit, yet if the Committee on Rules should report such a rule, and this House by a majority vote should adopt it, that would preclude the right to make such motion.

Why, Mr. Speaker, only the other day the Committee on Rules reported a rule in regard to an appropriation bill, the legislative, executive, and judicial, to supersede temporarily the entire rules of this House by a special rule in order to make certain things which were in that appropriation bill not subject to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the last proposition in this subdivision—

Nor shall it—

That is the Committee on Rules—

report any rule or order which shall operate to prevent a motion to recommit being made as provided in paragraph 4 of Rule XVI.

What does that mean?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That means that the Committee on Rules shall not report it, but even conceding that they have reported rules which exclude that right, the Committee on Rules has a right to report it to the House, and if the House adopts it such action would abrogate that part of the rule, because it temporarily sets aside the rules of the House.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. In a moment. The House by a majority vote can adopt any special rule that temporarily suspends the general rules of the House, as it has frequently done in the past.

The SPEAKER. This rule says that the Committee on Rules shall not report such an order.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. But, Mr. Speaker, if the Committee on Rules should do it.

Mr. NORRIS. That is where my question comes in.

Mr. MANN. That is where my point of order comes in.

The SPEAKER. And suppose the Chair refuses to entertain a motion to consider a resolution from the Committee on Rules which contravenes the general rule referred to?

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman, Suppose any other committee does something which under the rules they are not allowed to do. The proper thing to call it to the attention of the Chair then is a point of order that they have gone beyond their jurisdiction. The Chair finds it has done that, then is it not the duty of the Chair to so hold that they have exceeded their power?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, there is no controversy about that, but would the Chair hold that this rule can not be amended to-day or abrogated by a special rule and that it never can be changed because it is in the rules?

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair would not hold anything of the sort. You can report any rule which you see fit to put upon the books, but as long as that section stands there the Committee on Rules is precluded from bringing in such a resolution as this one. If you bring in a resolution amending the rules, that is a proposition which, of course, the Chair would entertain; but you are not bringing in a resolution to amend the rules, you are bringing in a resolution which violates a rule of the House.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Rules does not intend to prevent a motion to recommit being made, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is entirely incorrect in his diagnosis of the case in this instance. That is all there is to it. The Committee on Rules has no objection to a motion to recommit being made.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman allow another question? I want to ask the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, if the Committee on Rules brought in a rule here setting aside Calendar Wednesday by less than a two-thirds vote whether a point of order against that rule would be sustained by the Chair?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, I think the Committee on Rules could bring in any special rule temporarily suspending the rules of this House, and if it was adopted by a majority vote, it would prevail.

Mr. NORRIS. But before it is adopted and somebody calls attention to it and makes the point of order. If that is not the right theory, then what effect does this rule have which says the Committee on Rules shall not bring in a rule setting aside Calendar Wednesday by less than a two-thirds vote.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think it is all buncombe.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wrote the provisions which are found in this rule. I drafted them myself, and they were drafted to obviate great abuses in this House. I do not believe that very many ever gave me much credit for the desire to accomplish that purpose, but that was the purpose. The Speaker will recollect that in the last Congress on several occasions when it was proposed to report special rules to the House from the Committee on Rules I called the attention of the committee to the fact that if those rules were reported without putting in the provision excepting the motion to recommit I should make a point of order against them when they were presented to the House. These provisions were designed to prevent two things being done—one was to prevent Calendar Wednesday from being set aside, in an indirect way, by less than a two-thirds vote by a limitation upon the extraordinary powers of the Committee on Rules, and the other was to prevent the Committee on Rules, at times when partisan advantage would make it politically expedient, to deny to the minority the right to have a vote upon some important matter by bringing in a rule to deprive the minority of that privilege. I believed the minority should not be deprived of that right when I was in the minority, and I never advocated a rule when I was in the minority that I am not willing to live under when I am a Member of the majority. [Applause.] If there is anything that can properly be asserted about the procedure of the House of Representatives, it is that the rules should be so framed that there would not be partisan controversies about them. Everyone should be willing to have the same rules apply to them, whether in the majority or minority in the House. [Applause.] The temptation to take advantage of the minority is so great that no party should ever be in a position where it can ride ruthlessly over them. Indeed, the whole theory of the rules of the House—and that is very frequently forgotten—is that they are framed to protect, not the majority, not to enable the majority to do business, but to protect the minority from the exercise of arbitrary power by the majority.

I do not believe that it was intended by this particular resolution that the motion to recommit should be denied to whoever should happen to be opposed to this particular bill, but I do say that the language of this resolution—

That at the expiration of such time the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and said substitute to final passage, and that the House shall immediately proceed to vote on the bill and substitute without any intervening motion—operates to violate the rule which places a prohibition upon the Committee on Rules to cut out the motion to recommit as provided in section 4 of paragraph 4, Rule XVI.

I do not know that the question has before been presented to the House. I do know that upon one occasion a rule was brought in making a bill a continuing order. My recollection is that the point of order was raised against it. I am not certain whether it was passed upon at that time, although the gentleman who was then Speaker said that the House, without objection, might adopt such a rule, which would make a bill a continuing order so as to eliminate Calendar Wednesday. The time was never reached, however, or no attempt was made under that special order to eliminate Calendar Wednesday. But unless the House is protected by the point of order, both of these rules could be made ineffective.

There is a rule, for instance, which prohibits the Speaker from entertaining a motion or a request that anybody, except those persons designated in the rule, be admitted to the floor of the House. One of the rules prevents the Speaker from entertaining the motion for a recess on Calendar Wednesday. He could not entertain those motions without violating the rules. If he attempted to do so, he could be prevented by raising the question of order. It seems to me that the gentleman's point of order as interposed must be sustained as to the rule, although I suppose there will be no objection if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] should ask to modify the report by excepting the motion to recommit.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. This same provision was in the rule reported to consider pension bills the day the two gentlemen from Georgia, Mr. TRIBBLE and Mr. RODDENBERY, got up the opposition. But if there is any doubt about the question, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be amended by adding at the end of line 12 the words:

Except a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asks unanimous consent to add at the end of the resolution the words:

Except a motion to recommit.

Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, on the point of order I would like to make a remark, if the Chair will indulge me. This rule, if adopted by the House, would clearly cut off the motion to recommit. I recollect very well when the rule was adopted touching the motion to recommit, and the prohibition upon the Committee on Rules from reporting any special order for the consideration of the House that would prevent that motion being made.

It is somewhat interesting, Mr. Speaker, if I may be indulged for a moment, in the light of parliamentary disagreement in the House of Representatives, to just reminisce for a moment. There is a way, in the event the Chair should sustain the point of order upon this resolution reported by the Committee on Rules, by which this rule could be considered, and that would be an appeal from the decision of the Chair to the House, and the majority would then have a chance to overrule the Speaker when he sustains the point of order, if he should do so, to this provision in this rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. Suppose somebody appealed from the decision of the Chair and somebody else moved to table, and the latter motion carried, how would you get an opportunity to discuss that proposition?

Mr. CANNON. After all is said and done, we are discussing it now. A majority of the House now, as always, can determine what it will do touching its order of business and touching legislation, rules or no rules. A majority of the House may violate every rule that is made, by a majority vote, and it has in the past so done as to some of the rules.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman mean by that that the Chair ought to afford a majority of the House the opportunity to violate by an indirect attack a plain rule written into the regular standing rules of the House?

Mr. CANNON. I take it for granted that whoever is Speaker of this House, or whoever has been Speaker of this House in over a hundred years of existence, or whoever will be Speaker of this House, has ruled or will rule upon all questions of order as he believes he ought to rule.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, of course. But here is the practical proposition here——

Mr. CANNON. And it is always subject to an appeal.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course.

Mr. CANNON. I have known Speakers of this House, when gentlemen have arisen to questions of the highest constitutional privilege, to decide upon the point of order that it is not a constitutional privilege. I have known an appeal to be taken by gentlemen against that decision, and I have seen a majority of the House overrule the Speaker. Aye, more. I have seen inside of 12 months a majority of the House reverse itself. We are always subject to a majority.

Now, one word in conclusion.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not want the gentleman to conclude until I ask him a question.

Mr. CANNON. The Speaker has already, by a question, as I understand, as a Member of the House, substantially pointed the way by which this rule could be amended otherwise than by the Speaker being overruled by a majority, in the event there was a majority that would overrule him, on whatever decision he might make. If there be a czar now in existence in this House of Representatives, it is not the Speaker but the Committee on Rules, that, by reporting this rule, has announced its intention that it will be a czar and defy the rules when they write in "not subject to an intervening motion," which would nullify that rule. Sometimes, in the light of history, I wonder upon what meat does this our Cæsar, or our Cæsars, feed that they have grown so great.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY]?

Mr. CANNON. With pleasure.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. As I remember, exactly this same language was in the rule when the pension bills were considered. Why did not the gentleman think of his point of order then and make it against the consideration of the pension bills?

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman claim because his committee has played czar once and it was overlooked that that makes a precedent that permanently makes the gentleman and his committee a czar?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not claim that we played the czar. There is a monopoly on that in another direction.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I have the honor to serve in the minority. This rule was made. I agreed that it was a proper rule when it was made; and if it is to be changed the gentleman can report a resolution from his committee changing it, and the House can then in its wisdom proceed to consider, amend, change, or adopt without amendment.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asks unanimous consent to modify this rule by adding, after the last word in it, the words "except a motion to recommit."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Texas will ask unanimous consent, not as a report from the Committee on Rules, but as offered by himself, for the adoption of the resolution with the modification, I shall not make a point of order upon it or object.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I did not catch all that the gentleman said. Some one was talking to me.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman himself will ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution with the modification that he makes, not as a report from the Committee on Rules, I shall not object.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think that the gentleman from Texas must do that. He can now speak only of an amendment as an individual and not in behalf of the Committee on Rules, because the Committee on Rules have not considered the amendment which he proposes.

Mr. MANN. I understand. The gentleman has reported a rule from the Committee on Rules on which I have made a point of order.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, this is an important matter, and in order to relieve the situation I submit the request in that form.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know just exactly what the gentleman's request is.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That this resolution be considered now with an amendment added, "except a motion to recommit."

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand it, that comes from the gentleman as a Member of the House, and not from the Committee on Rules?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, I would like to say to the gentleman that it seems to me this rule, regardless of the bill to which it makes reference, is one that is contrary to good and fair practice in legislation.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that of course the unanimous consent is not to pass the resolution, but simply to consider it.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course I recognize that the gentleman could call the Committee on Rules together and reintroduce the resolution.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; and I would do that in about three minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and I would not want it understood, so far as I am personally concerned, that in permitting the gentleman to get unanimous consent for the consideration of the rule I gave acquiescence to the rule or to the method of procedure.

Mr. MANN. Well, of course we do not—any of us over here—give acquiescence to it.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not do that, even if I were heartily in favor of the bill. I would not want to adopt this rule even in that case.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know what the gentleman proposes by way of debate and discussion on this rule, if it is to be taken up by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will permit, this controversy has nothing to do with that. That will come up later.

Mr. DALZELL. As I understand, Mr. Speaker, the situation is this: This rule was improperly reported. It is not before the House and subject to amendment. The only way it can come up is by unanimous consent. I reserve the right to withhold consent until I can find out the mode that will be used in considering it. I do not think it is quite fair that the gentleman should be accorded unanimous consent for the consideration of this proposition.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think we can agree as to time, but of course I do not intend to be tied down on time. As to that the gentleman knows I am inclined to be liberal about time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania expects to be reasonable about that.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. So do I.

Mr. DALZELL. I would like to know as to the time to be allowed for amendment and consideration.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The rule provides for the offering of a substitute by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] and, as proposed to be amended, it allows a motion to recommit.

Mr. LENROOT. It is not the gentleman's intention to move the previous question immediately?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Oh, no. This is such an important matter that we do not want to take any hurried action.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the amendment is agreed to. The point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], of course, being withdrawn, under the circumstances——

Mr. MANN. The report of the committee is withdrawn, and the gentleman offered his amendment as an individual proposition.

The SPEAKER. If the House will permit, it seems to the Chair that it will save trouble in the future if the Chair will now give his own construction of this rule under which the gentleman made his point of order. The question is liable to come up again at any time. The last clause of paragraph 56 of Rule XI provides:

Nor shall it—

That is, the Committee on Rules—

report any rule or order which shall operate to prevent the motion to recommit being made as provided in paragraph 4 of Rule XVI.

Jefferson's Manual opens with this paragraph:

Mr. Onslow, the ablest among the Speakers of the House of Commons, used to say, "It was a maxim he had often heard when he was a young man, from old and experienced members, that nothing tended more to throw power into the hands of administration, and those who acted with the majority of the House of Commons, than a neglect of, or departure from, the rules of proceeding; that these forms, as instituted by our ancestors, operated as a check and control on the actions of the majority, and that they were, in many instances, a shelter and protection to the minority against the attempts of power."

The Chair does not think the essence of the proposition was ever better stated than it is in those words. Rules are made primarily to fix an order of business and to preserve and maintain decorum. But they are also fixed in order that the minority in the lump and the individual member shall have all the rights that are permissible in a legislative body.

It is not necessary to go into the history of how this particular rule came to be adopted, but that it was intended that the right to make the motion to recommit should be preserved inviolate the Chair has no doubt whatever. If this arrangement as to amending the resolution had not been made, the Chair would have sustained the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. The fact that the rule about the pension bill got through without anybody raising an objection is neither here nor there. The Chair supposes that nobody was enough opposed to it to raise the point, or everybody forgot it or neglected it. All rules, good or bad, ought to be enforced. Sometimes it may be inconvenient, but that does not matter. For instance, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] cited a rule which the Chair has been compelled to enforce privately a dozen times, or perhaps a score of times. It is this: There is one motion which the Chair is prohibited from putting, and that is the motion to admit to the floor of the House anybody, great or small, whom the rules do not admit. I have had a dozen or a score of applications from people whom I would like very much to accommodate, to be permitted to come in on the floor of the House, and I have told them what the rule was. That rule is founded in good sense, and this one is founded in right; and the Chair will maintain the rule. I think it was left out on this occasion by inadvertence or something of the sort.

The Chair thought it was proper to make that statement now in order to save trouble in the future.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] how much time he desires.

Mr. DALZELL. How much time does the gentleman suggest on the rule?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It seems to me 20 minutes on a side on the rule ought to be sufficient. Three hours' general debate are allowed on the bill.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not think that is very generous. However, I will ask 25 minutes on a side.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have no objection.

Mr. MANN. Half an hour.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Or even half an hour, if the gentleman wants it. I ask unanimous consent that the debate on the rule be limited to one hour, 30 minutes on a side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asks unanimous consent that the debate on the rule be limited to one hour.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That at the end of the hour I have the right to move the previous question and the time to be controlled, 30 minutes by myself and 30 minutes by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

The SPEAKER. And that at the end of the hour the gentleman from Texas has the right to move the previous question——

Mr. MANN. He has that right anyway.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; I understand that.

The SPEAKER. And that the time be controlled, one half by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to take up much time in the discussion of the rule, and I do not intend at this time to devote any attention to the discussion of the details of the proposed bill known as the Clayton anti-injunction bill.

I wish to say that this Congress is proceeding to carry out its promises to the American voters and that one platform pledge after another has been redeemed by this Democratic House.

Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the House submitted to the States an important amendment to the Constitution, which, in my judgment, is far-reaching and of vital concern to the people everywhere. In my opinion the election of United States Senators by a direct vote is one of the greatest reforms ever brought about by the American people, and I trust that that amendment will be speedily ratified by three-fourths of the States. [Applause.]

To-day we are here for the purpose of redeeming another platform pledge and to write in the statutes of the United States a decree that hereafter midnight injunctions issued by Federal judges shall not be tolerated under the laws of this country, and shall forever cease. [Applause.]

We have inveighed against the tyranny of Federal judges unjustly issuing injunctions. We have said that their powers should be curtailed, inasmuch as they are the mere creatures of this Government. We are not here for the purpose of assailing the judiciary. Every man in the Republic should have a salutary respect for the courts, because if we undermine the confidence of the people in the courts and undertake to destroy them we imperil the very genius and spirit of our Government.

What have we promised the people? Let me call the attention of this House to our platform pledge, which we are this day redeeming by the passage of this measure:

The courts of justice are the bulwark of our liberties, and we yield to none in our purpose to maintain their dignity. Our party has given to the bench a long line of distinguished justices, who have added to the respect and confidence in which this department must be jealously maintained. We resent the attempt of the Republican Party to raise a false issue respecting the judiciary. It is unjust reflection upon a great body of our citizens to assume that they lack respect for the courts.

It is the function of the courts to interpret the laws which the people create, and if the laws appear to work economic, social, or political injustice it is our duty to change them. The only basis upon which the integrity of our courts can stand is that of unswerving justice and protection of life, personal liberty, and property. If judicial processes may be abused, we should guard them against abuse.

Experience has proven the necessity of a modification of the present law relating to injunctions, and we reiterate the pledge of our national platform of 1896 and 1904 in favor of the measure which passed the United States Senate in 1896, but which a Republican Congress has ever since refused to enact, relating to contempts in Federal courts and providing for trial by jury in cases of indirect contempt.

Questions of judicial practice have arisen, especially in connection with industrial disputes. We believe that the parties to all judicial proceedings shall be treated with rigid impartiality, and that injunctions should not be issued in any cases in which injunctions would not issue if no industrial dispute were involved.

Mr. Speaker, that is the decree of the Democratic Party, adopted at Denver four years ago. Thrice has the Democratic Party declared in favor of this legislation, and now that the people have given us their confidence and placed us in control of this branch of Congress we propose to redeem that pledge and to send it to the other body.

Mr. Speaker, let no one misunderstand the attitude of the Democratic Party. We are not opposed to wealth legitimately acquired. We are not opposed to corporations and legitimate corporate interests, but are opposed to the abuses that have been indulged in by some who have acquired vast amounts of money, who have combined great interests and corporations together as trusts. We are against these things, and, so far as we can, shall endeavor to bring relief to the American people by passing this measure and others similar to it that will bring about the result that we desire.

Mr. Speaker, the Democratic Party does not wish to array one class of citizens against another class. He would indeed be a dangerous citizen who would endeavor to array the poor man against his richer brother because he happens to be wealthy by legitimate thrift. Such spirit could not be tolerated. We all know, and it is admitted, that the Federal courts, the mere creatures of Congress, have exceeded the authority originally conferred upon them by our fathers, and the time has come to call a halt. The time has arrived when we should take them within our jurisdiction and set the limits and say, "Thus far shall the Federal judges go, and no farther."

The Clayton bill does that, and, in my judgment, when it is written into our permanent jurisprudence it will be there to remain, for it is in behalf of the American people and against those who would pervert our institutions. [Applause.]

So, Mr. Speaker, I think that the time is now opportune to pass this bill. In a short while another measure will be presented, and I believe it will commend itself to the honest judgment of this body and the American people. I refer to the measure providing for a trial by jury in cases of indirect contempt. That measure has already been agreed upon by the Committee on the Judiciary and reported to this House, and when it is passed, in connection with the one we are now considering to-day, then the Democratic Party will have redeemed its pledges. All we can do is to bring them before the House and let the Members consider them; and although the gentleman from Illinois refers to the Committee on Rules as assuming the prerogatives of a "czar," I undertake to say that the Committee on Rules has brought before the Sixty-second Congress more salutary and just measures than ever came before this body during his incumbency of eight years as Speaker of the House.

It is not necessary for me to review them, but I will refer to a few of them: The parcel post, the publicity bill, this injunction measure, the bill defining contempts, the trial by jury in cases of indirect contempt, and many other meritorious measures that the great body of the Democrats in caucus have demanded to be considered; the revision of the tariff, taking the burden off of the backs of the people—all these measures the gentleman from Illinois stifled and prevented consideration of while he occupied the Speakership.

So, Mr. Speaker, we are here again to-day to allow the Members to vote on these questions. We are allowing one substitute to be offered, which is sufficient. We are willing to authorize a motion to recommit, which ought to be much more than sufficient; but at any rate, the membership can take any course it desires. They can adopt either measure that appeals to them, and can exercise their choice in the pending matters of legislation. There is no endeavor now to thwart their will. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, if this rule is adopted it will be in order for the House to consider the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, which deals with the subject of injunctions. There is a provision in the bill relative to the notice to be given on application for an injunction or restraining order, for the security to be given in case the injunction is granted, and some other provisions relative to procedure, which, in my judgment, are matters of great importance.

But aside from these the bill goes on to provide for certain things which thoroughly revolutionize the law in injunction cases in this country, and they are of such tremendous importance that it seems to me they deserve the most serious consideration on the part of the membership of the House at this time. The bill provides that in a labor dispute, where there is a dispute between employer and employee, or between employees, there can be no preliminary injunction or restraining order issued unless it be necessary to prevent irreparable injury or where there is no adequate remedy at law.

An injunction is confined by this bill to the defense of property and property rights. Now, I have sought information as to what was meant by the term "property rights," but I have been unable to get any satisfactory information upon that subject. My conclusion, therefore, is simply the conclusion to be arrived at from the surrounding circumstances. It has long been contended upon the part of certain persons in this country, notably labor organizations, that outside of property, courts of equity had no jurisdiction—I mean, tangible property; that the right to do business, the good will, personal rights, are entirely outside of the proper functions of a court of equity in exercising injunction jurisdiction.

A bill was introduced into this House, and improperly referred to the Committee on Labor, regulating this subject. That bill is reported and is now before the House. In that bill provision is made that injunctions or restraining orders shall not issue to protect what are here called property rights, and they do not include the right to do business. I apprehend, taking into consideration the fact that that bill was introduced after the Committee on the Judiciary had refused to report a bill containing any such proposition, this term "property rights" in this bill is a provision whereby the committee, instead of openly and courageously and avowedly adopting the language and purpose of the bill reported by the Committee on Labor, evasively and indirectly seeks to accomplish the same purpose. So I apprehend that I state the case fairly when I say that under the provisions of this bill there can not be in a labor dispute any injunction or restraining order, unless to prevent irreparable damage, or where there is no adequate remedy at law, and that in such case injunction shall extend only to protect tangible property. The bill then goes on to provide that there are certain cases in which there shall be no injunction or restraining order, whether there be irreparable damage or not. That is the plain meaning of the bill.

The bill also goes on to say—

> And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising—

And so forth.

Naming a number of specific cases. That is to say, where there exists such irreparable injury or lack of an adequate remedy at law to such an extent as to justify or authorize a court of equity to grant a restraining order or injunction, even in that case there are certain acts that are outside of the law and which can not be reached by a court of equity. That is true in the case of strikes. Suppose an injunction be issued for some cause upon the ground of irreparable injury to ensue or because there is no adequate remedy at law. The injunctive process in that case will not reach a strike or could not prohibit and prevent anything to be done by the strikers without regard to whether there was an irreparable injury or lack of an adequate remedy at law.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] shakes his head, and I have no doubt he has examined this bill, and I have very great respect for his judgment, but the fact that he and I differ as to the construction of this bill only illustrates how unjust it is to call upon this assembly at this time—the representatives of the American people—to dispose of this question after three hours of perfunctory debate; and that is the vice of the rule.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALZELL. I have not very much time, but I will yield.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman took occasion to call attention to the gentleman from Kentucky when he had not interrupted him at all. Does not the difference of opinion simply show that men sometimes read a statute in a different way? In this case the gentleman prefaces his whole statement on not what the words "property or property rights" will mean, but on what he thinks they must mean because of another bill that is not now before the House?

Mr. DALZELL. Well, I am not discussing that question now, and I am willing to leave my construction of the bill to the judgment of the gentlemen who have heard me.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield? I do not want to take up the gentleman's time——

Mr. DALZELL. I hope the gentleman will not take up my time.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon. I had forgotten his time was limited.

Mr. DALZELL. One of the particular acts that are removed from the injunctive process by this bill are strikes. Strikes are legalized upon the one hand, and the blacklist is legalized upon the other hand. Another are boycotts. They are legalized—not simply primary boycotts, but the secondary boycott—where parties not parties to the dispute—innocent parties who have no remedy at law—are deprived of the protective arm of a court of equity. Picketing is legalized, and it matters not to what extent the picketing may reach, it matters not that it may amount to a mob and result in destruction of property, under the provisions of this bill the party who is injured is removed from the protecting arm of the court of equity. Not only that, but this bill repeals the Sherman antitrust law in so far as labor combinations are concerned. It matters not what may be the character of the conspiracy, it matters not how much it may interfere with interstate commerce, the men who are guilty of that conspiracy and who are interfering with commerce are removed from the restraints of the law.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DALZELL. In other words, this bill selects a certain class of a community whom it makes not amenable to the law and selects another class of the community from whom it takes the protection of the law. It is to that extent, in my judgment, unconstitutional. Not only that, but it repeals the law of conspiracy. All the acts which were done in the Danbury hatters case, all the acts which were done in connection with the Pullman car strike, all the acts which were done in connection with the attempted paralyzing of the railroad industries in this country, all such acts as these are legalized by this act. Under this bill there can be no injunction against a strike, a boycott, or a picketing, no matter what their consequences may be. Now, if that be so—and I am willing to stand upon my construction of the terms of this bill—if that be so, is not it true that this House is entitled to have the most thorough consideration, an opportunity for the most matured deliberation, before it passes upon a measure of such importance, a measure so far-reaching in its consequences, so vital to the interests of life and property in this country? And what sort of consideration are you going to have under this rule? Three hours of general debate, three hours of perfunctory debate, without any opportunity to amend. You must take this bill or leave it without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i" on the part of the representatives of the American people dealing with legislation of this character. I say, and I say that with knowledge, that there never was brought into this House a rule which showed so much of tyrannical, unreasonable power on the part of the majority as is to be found in the provisions of this rule. Whom are you afraid of, gentlemen? Not afraid of Members on this side of the House. We have not votes enough on this side of the aisle to amend or modify or in anywise effect any legislation that you may see fit to propose. It is not the membership on this side of the House of whom you are afraid. It is the membership upon your own side of the House. You gentlemen know that you have Members who would be unwilling to take this legislation in the shape in which it is proposed if they had an opportunity to do otherwise. You have had no caucus on this bill so as to gag Members on that side of the House in respect to this legislation, but you propose to gag them now by this rule. You are gagging not only us, but gagging yourselves.

I do not propose to take up any more time in a discussion of the merits of this proposition. They will be discussed hereafter, in so far as they can within the limited extent of three hours' debate, but I want to insist that this rule is an unjust proposition, one that shows that you gentlemen are not standing by the professions which you made when you proceeded to revise the rules of this House and promised that hereafter the membership of the House should have free and unlimited debate upon all propositions of the character of this proposition now before the House. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question, which will only take a moment? Did not the gentleman have it in his power to object to the consideration of this particular proposition a few minutes ago, and did he object?

Mr. DALZELL. I do not think the gentleman is quite fair in accusing me.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am not accusing the gentleman. I am asking the gentleman a question. I do not make an accusation.

Mr. DALZELL. I could have objected if I had been mean enough to do it.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield? He made his statement that this bill repealed the antitrust law in regard to labor unions. I would like to ask him in what section of the bill?

Mr. DALZELL. All of them. It repeals the law of conspiracy. I can not yield to the gentleman. How much time have I used?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the subject matter contained in the bill which it is proposed to consider under this rule is no new question. It has been considered and discussed from every political platform in this country. It has been reviewed from all its angles, and it occurs to me that we do not require at this time any more than three hours in which to consider it in this House.

The assumption on the part of those who are opposing this measure is that labor, and particularly organized labor, is asking at the hands of Congress some immunity from the operations of the law; that they are asking that they shall be given some special privileges under the law.

But they are not asking anything of the kind. What they are asking is that they shall be considered fairly and treated justly under the law, the same when they have a trade dispute as when there is no trade dispute in existence. Under the methods that have grown up in our equity courts, the jurisdiction of the equity courts has been extended in cases arising during trade disputes to the jurisdiction of our law courts, and the assumption has been on the part of the equity courts that the employer of labor has a property right in a sufficient amount of labor to operate his plant. No such property right does or can exist unless the laborer himself is a serf or a slave. The workingman is just as much a free man as the employer. Some of our State courts and some of our Federal courts have laid down the principle that the employer is entitled to a free flow of labor to the gates of his factory, and when they have laid down that principle they have failed to take into consideration that the flow of labor is a flow of living, animate, intelligent beings that have a right to move to the gates of the factory or away from the gates of the factory as they see fit.

Injunctions have been issued in labor disputes by which men have been restrained from committing crimes, and when that jurisdiction has been assumed by the equity courts they have invaded the province of the law courts, and by invading the province of the law courts they have taken away from the workingman that protection which the Anglo-Saxon race has fought for for over a thousand years, namely, the protection of a trial by jury so as to determine the fact.

They have gone further than that. They have issued injunction by which men during labor disputes have been restrained from persuading their neighbors to engage with them in particular disputes. They have enjoined men from placing their patronage where they pleased or refusing to place it where they pleased. And this rule ought to be adopted at this time for the consideration of this measure, so that these and many other invasions of human rights may be abolished. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES]. [Applause.]

[Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I do not object to a special rule for the consideration of this very important subject. I do object to some of the provisions contained in this rule, and I wish to give notice now that if the previous question shall be voted down, I shall offer amendments to this rule, leaving three hours for consideration, as is proposed in the rule, but instead of three hours of general debate, there shall be one hour of general debate and two hours devoted to amendments and debate under the five-minute rule. And it should be thoroughly understood that when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] moves the previous question, a vote for the previous question is a vote against the right of this House to offer amendments to this bill.

Mr. Speaker, there is an old saying that the leopard can not change his spots. But the Democratic majority can, and it proposes to do so in this instance, unless there shall be a sufficient number of men on that side of the House who have more regard for consistency, who have more regard for the pledges they have made to their constituents, than they have for the mere matter of a majority voting as one body.

Mr. Speaker, upon a previous occasion, when a rule somewhat similar to this was introduced in this House and adopted, I quoted from distinguished Members of this House as to how, when they were in the minority, they looked upon rules of this character, and I am going now to make some of those quotations again, for they can not be quoted too often. And first I quote the distinguished Speaker of the House himself, who presides over this House with so much ability and fairness. When the Payne tariff bill was before this House and there was a curtailment of the right of amendment by a special rule proposed by the majority upon that bill, a great tariff bill, involving thousands of items, when there was some reason for curtailing the power of amendment, this is what the present Speaker of the House said at that time:

> The situation in this matter is this: I am against this rule and every rule like it. My position is that the humblest man in this House, the veriest congressional tenderfoot here, has the right to offer an amendment to any item of this bill from A to Z.

That was the opinion of your Speaker then upon a great tariff bill, while here is a bill four pages long, containing three sections only, and yet you are asked to go squarely back upon the position which you then took when you were in the minority. And I am anxious, if I may say it, to know whether the distinguished Speaker himself, when the vote comes upon the previous question in half an hour from now, will maintain the position that he took when he was in the minority or whether by his vote to-day he will say before the country, "I was not sincere when I said those things then, and now that we are in the majority I propose to do the very things that we condemned Cannonism for doing." For, gentlemen on the other side, your vote for the previous question means that and nothing else.

Now, I will quote another distinguished gentleman, the distinguished leader of the majority [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. He said:

The rules of this House for a hundred years have recognized that when you come to consider a great appropriation bill, or a great revenue bill, the only way the House can express the sentiments of the country and the Members can express the sentiments of their constituents is to consider the items contained in the bill item by item—

Again pleading for the right of amendment, which you propose to deny to the House now. And here we have two of your distinguished candidates for the Presidency of the United States. I wonder whether, in the votes that they shall shortly cast, they will take the position that they are going to be consistent with the principles that they advocated then or whether they are not. And the American people are going to be interested in knowing that.

One more quotation, Mr. Speaker, and that is from the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who said upon that occasion:

I have that confidence in the House of Representatives that if I had my way I would be willing to permit this bill to be considered section by section, item by item, so that the people's representatives might have an opportunity to discharge their duties. I shall await with some curiosity to see how those who have been recently professing themselves as anxious to relieve this House from the so-called system of tyrannical rules will vote at this time upon this rule.

And I shall await with a great deal of curiosity how those gentlemen to-day will vote upon this rule.

But, Mr Speaker, more than that, there should be the right of amendment to this bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON], who has preceded me, has reported from his committee a bill known as the Bartlett bill, and one-half of that bill is upon the identical subject that this bill covers. Those bills ought to be considered together, because some of their provisions are absolutely inconsistent. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] or the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] ought to have an opportunity to offer as an amendment to this bill that portion of the Bartlett bill that does cover this subject. How else can you legislate consistently upon it?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Rules, and a resolution is pending before that committee to report out the Bartlett bill?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; and I want to report it out. But I want to say to the gentleman that if you pass that bill it nullifies a portion of this. There is no doubt about that. These measures ought to be considered together.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think so.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, if the gentleman thinks so, he will vote against the previous question and give an opportunity to this House to consider them together.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment? I have no time, but I want to say that every labor organization in my State has sent me telegrams insisting that the bill now before the Committee on Rules known as the Bartlett bill shall be voted on.

Mr. LENROOT. If the gentleman will vote against the previous question, that will be a vote to give an opportunity to offer his bill as an amendment to this, and if that is agreed to he will have an opportunity to serve his constituents in that way.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think I will.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, Mr. Speaker, another word in closing. I shall not reveal any secrets of the Committee on Rules, nor do I wish to; but when this Congress first organized, when the majority members of the Committee on Rules desired to bring into this House a drastic rule, they did not know how to draw it, and so they invariably went to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], and he very kindly drew their rules for them.

Mr. GARNER. He is recognized to be an expert in that business.

Mr. LENROOT. But they are no longer doing that. They have become experts themselves now and can go far beyond anything that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] ever did. In fact, in this very rule they went so far beyond him, attempting to bring in a rule so much more drastic than he ever drew, that the Speaker of this House this morning was compelled to hold the rule out of order because it was more drastic than even the jurisdiction, broad as it is, of the Committee on Rules permitted. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. If no other gentleman desires to discuss this question the Chair will put it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Did the gentleman from Texas have control of the time? I did not understand that to be a part of the agreement.

The SPEAKER. The agreement was that half the time should be controlled by the gentleman from Texas and the other half by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understood the agreement to be that the time was to be equally divided between the two sides.

The SPEAKER. It was to be equally divided, but the control of it was to be as the Chair has stated.

[Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield the rest of my time to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is recognized for six minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I want, if I can, to get the House back to the parliamentary situation and to the issue that is now before us. I want to call your attention to the fact that the bills that have been mostly discussed by gentlemen who have so far talked on this subject, are not now before the House.

We have here a rule, and nothing except the rule is now before the House. Upon that rule we are soon to be called upon to vote. I am not criticizing any man for his views upon the subject of this legislation, but I do contend that there is no justice, no fairness, and no patriotism in the adoption of rules of this kind, ironclad as this one is. I am in favor of legislating on this subject, but it ought to be done by the House. It is no relief that we are to be allowed three hours of general debate. What good does it do to be allowed to talk, if we are not allowed to propose amendments? Three or four men bring in a bill, and this rule says we must take it as a whole or reject it as a whole, except that one Member of the House shall be given the extraordinary privilege of offering an amendment by way of substitute.

We have here a rule which says that a certain bill shall be immediately taken up after the rule is adopted. That is a bill consisting of four sections, less than four pages long. The rule says that after general debate of three hours it shall be in order for one gentleman of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], to offer an amendment by way of a substitute. Why am I deprived of my constitutional right, that ought to be preserved, to offer an amendment to this bill? Why has the gentleman who has just left the floor, who said he would rather have a broader bill—why is he deprived of his right to offer an amendment to this bill? Why, out of a membership of 391, do we come only to the gentleman from Illinois and say that he shall be accorded the distinction of offering an amendment? Why should not this bill come before the House like any other bill and every Member who has an amendment to offer be allowed to offer it? Why should this bill, not much longer than your finger, be put through the House without any man having a right to even suggest an amendment? Is that liberty; is that freedom of representation? Are not my people just as good, just as intelligent, just as patriotic, just as wise as the people represented by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING]? How about all you people over here? Do you believe this is a square deal? Do you think it is square to take this bill up and say, "Gentlemen, you must take this bill just as we have prepared it, or you must take an amendment that only one man in the world shall have the privilege of offering in its stead"? How many of you on this side of the House have had anything to do with the framing of that little piece of legislation?

Mind you, I do not criticize the men who did frame it. There are very many good things in it, but it is not perfect, and why should we tie our hands by the adoption of this rule that will deprive us of the right of offering amendments? I am in sympathy with the legislation, but if I were the author of it, it seems to me I would be usurping your privileges, your people's privileges, if I should say to you, "I will draw this bill, and you must take it as I draw it or you must reject it."

That is not the way to legislate. That is not the way the people of this country expect us to legislate, and I want to say to you, my Democratic friends, it will be no answer before the people to say that the Republicans, when they were in power, pursued the same course. I condemned that method when my party was in power, and so did you. I am of the same opinion now. Why have you changed yours? Why not let this bill come before the House with the right of amendment? Why should we refuse to let every man here have the right to offer amendments? What does three hours of general debate mean?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. My time is very short, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. The gentleman is not complaining that he has not had the opportunity to move an amendment or to bring in a bill or report because he is a member of the committee?

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; but that does not make any difference. Although I am a member of the committee that reported it, I am excluded the same as my friend from Colorado is, and I ought to be. I ought to have no more privileges here than he, and no one else ought to have any more than I. I plead only for equality, and we ought to vote down this rule. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, let the House understand the attitude of the gentleman from Nebraska. The distinguished insurgent insurges on the slightest provocation. Let me say that when his party was in power in this House they would not let this injunction legislation be considered in any form. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, if the previous question is voted down and this legislation submitted to that side of the House, they would devour everything in the bill that is good.

The gentleman's motive for wanting the previous question voted down is to create confusion and gain delay of legislation we are about to pass. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON], who is a better friend to labor legislation than is the gentleman from Nebraska, has spoken favoring the previous question, and the gentleman from New Jersey has spoken in favor of adopting the previous question, and is for this bill because he knows that the provisions are correct, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN], than whom there is no better friend to the laboring man in this country [applause], has spoken advocating the previous question and favors the bill. He is not so weak, nor is anyone on this side of the House, as to throw down the bars and let you gentlemen assault the good features of this legislation. If you are in favor of the measure, when the time comes, vote for it. We allow you to offer one amendment when you would not allow us to even consider the subject. You may do more, you may offer a substitute and, after that, a motion to recommit and assert your views as to the kind of legislation you think we should have. And when you do it, if it is not a better bill, we will stand ready to pass this one and vote you down. This legislation has been agreed to by those who really favor it, and they think it is of the best character obtainable at this time, and therefore the previous question should be adopted and the rule passed.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. MANN. And on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 174, nays 99, answered "present" 9, not voting 110, as follows:

REGULATION OF INJUNCTIONS.

The SPEAKER. There are three hours of general debate, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] and the other half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. HENRY of Texas. By the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in the rule as to who shall control the time. It will have to be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time be controlled, one half by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and the other half by the leading minority member on the same committee, Mr. STERLING.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that he control one half the time and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] control the other half. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 23635) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 263 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows, and that said act be further amended by inserting after section 266 thereof three new sections, to be numbered, respectively, 266a, 266b, and 266c, reading as follows:

"SEC. 263. That no injunction, whether interlocutory or permanent, in cases other than those described in section 266 of this title, shall be issued without previous notice and an opportunity to be heard on behalf of the parties to be enjoined, which notice, together with a copy of the bill of complaint or other pleading upon which the application for such injunction will be based, shall be served upon the parties sought to be enjoined a reasonable time in advance of such application. But if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court or judge that immediate and irreparable injury is likely to ensue to the complainant, and that the giving of notice of the application or the delay incident thereto would probably permit the doing of the act sought to be restrained before notice could be served or hearing had thereon, the court or judge may, in his discretion, issue a temporary restraining order without notice. Every such order shall be indorsed with the date and hour of issuance, shall be forthwith entered of record, shall define the injury and state why it is irreparable and why the order was granted without notice, and shall by its terms expire within such time after entry, not to exceed seven days, as the court or judge may fix, unless within the time so fixed the order is extended or renewed for a like period, after notice to those previously served, if any, and for good cause shown, and the reasons for such extension shall be entered of record.

"SEC. 266a. That no restraining order or interlocutory order of injunction shall issue except upon the giving of security by the applicant in such sum as the court or judge may deem proper, conditioned upon the payment of such costs and damages as may be incurred or suffered by any party who may be found to have been wrongfully enjoined or restrained thereby.

"SEC. 266b. That every order of injunction or restraining order shall set forth the reasons for the issuance of the same, shall be specific in terms, and shall describe in reasonable detail, and not by reference to the bill of complaint or other document, the act or acts sought to be restrained; and shall be binding only upon the parties to the suit, their agents, servants, employees, and attorneys, or those in active concert with them, and who shall by personal service or otherwise have received actual notice of the same.

"SEC. 266c. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property or property right must be described with particularity in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

"And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works, or carries on business, or happens to be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working; or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute; or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value; or from peaceably assembling at any place in a lawful manner and for lawful purposes; or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto."

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the substitute at this time and have it read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21486) to regulate the granting of restraining orders and injunctions.

Be it enacted, etc., That no injunction, whether interlocutory or permanent, shall be issued by any Federal court or judge without previous notice and an opportunity to be heard on behalf of the parties to be enjoined; but if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court or judge, from the evidence or showing made, that immediate and irreparable injury is likely to ensue to the complainant, and that the giving of notice of the application or the delay incident thereto would probably permit the doing of the act sought to be restrained before notice could be served or hearing had thereon, the court or judge may, in his discretion, issue a temporary restraining order without notice. Every such order shall be entered of record, and shall define the injury, state why it is irreparable and why granted without notice, and also shall have indorsed thereon the date and hour of its issuance. Every such order issued without notice and an opportunity by the defendant to be heard shall expire within such time after service is made or notice given, which shall be made or given as speedily as possible, not to exceed seven days, as the court or judge may fix, unless within the time so fixed the order is extended or renewed by the court or judge, for good cause shown, after previous notice and an opportunity to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] is recognized.

[Mr. CLAYTON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen may have five legislative days in which to put in the RECORD remarks on the pending bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen shall have the privilege of printing remarks on this bill for five legislative days. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLAYTON. How much time have I consumed, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has consumed 56 minutes. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] is recognized.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the vice of considering this important bill under a special rule which limits debate upon its merits to the short space of one hour and a half on each side has already been made apparent to this House. At the very outset of this argument the limitation of time imposed upon me makes it impossible for me to discuss adequately the great underlying fundamental legal principles which should be carefully weighed by the House before any vote is taken upon the bill.

Three distinct reasons have been urged by the proponents of this rule as a necessity for speedy legislation upon this bill. It has been boldly proclaimed by the advocates of the bill that the United States courts are the creatures of Congress; that Congress has by legislation called them into existence, and that Congress has therefore the power to modify, control, or destroy their functions and to place all of the limitations it pleases upon their judicial power.

It has also been further asserted that these courts have abused that judicial power, that under existing laws they have employed the writ of injunction as an instrument of oppression to certain classes of the people, and that this unwarranted usurpation by the courts has created a pressing necessity for this legislation.

One speaker who has preceded me has, indeed, boldly declared that the courts of the United States have violated the elemental principles of justice, have substituted the equitable power of the court for the criminal processes of the land, have punished crime through the medium of the writ of injunction, and have therefore deprived the citizens of the United States of the most sacred of all of our fundamental rights—the right of trial by jury.

Mr. Speaker, it had been my purpose in this argument to answer fully each of these assertions, to controvert absolutely each of these three propositions, but the limited time at my disposal and the necessity for an extended investigation of the provisions of the bill, make it possible for me to refer only briefly to these declarations.

No more serious and dangerous error has been advanced in modern times than the proposition that the judicial power of the United States courts is a creation of the Congress, that the functions and power of our courts have their origin in or derive their vitality from the legislative branch of the Government. The dangerous and pernicious doctrine of these modern times which finds its pretext in the demand for the recall of judges and the recall of judicial decisions has its origin in this error. Mr. Speaker, no man who is familiar with the Constitution of the United States and who is familiar with the historical facts that led to the adoption of that Constitution can for a moment doubt the error of that contention. The keystone of the arch of our constitutional government rests upon the absolute coordination and equality of its three great departments—the legislative, executive, and judicial. The wise builders of that Constitution, taught in the school of experience in the stormy days that preceded it, recognized the essential necessity for a complete separation between the judicial, executive, and legislative branches of the Government; and the superlative feature of that great instrument and that in which it differed essentially from any other government ever established was the placing of the judicial power of the courts equal to and coordinate with the legislative and executive powers, and that complete independence was accomplished by writing into the Constitution, in Article III, section 1, this declaration:

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish, etc.

The judicial power of our courts comes, therefore, from the Constitution of the United States and not from Congress. It derives its existence and its authority from the same source from which comes our legislative power. It is coordinate with and in all respects of equal potentiality to that power; and while the Constitution of the United States creates but one court and leaves to Congress the power to ordain such inferior courts as may be necessary for the operation of the Government, it is a fundamental principle of legal construction, established through a long line of judicial decisions and accepted as axiomatic, that these courts, when created and ordained, derive their judicial power from the Constitution and not from any act of Congress creating them. And therefore, Mr. Speaker, if it be found in the discussion of this bill that it seeks—as I am convinced it does—to strike down a part of the judicial powers of the courts vested by the Constitution, the legislation proposed by this bill is entirely beyond our power to enact.

But it is impossible, Mr. Speaker, for me to dwell longer upon this point, fundamental though it be, for I must proceed hastily to declare that the second proposition of the proponents of this measure is equally vicious and equally without reason, experience, or facts to sustain it. I refer to the assertion that the courts have abused their judicial power in the granting of injunctions; that they have made the injunctive processes of the courts an instrument of oppression for convicting men of crimes without the right of trial by jury, and have deprived them of their liberties without due process of law.

These assertions have been frequently made. They have been made the basis of political agitation, and have been industriously fomented to create a prejudice against our courts, but I stand here to assert their falsity and to declare to this House that they have never been established by evidence. I have been a member of the Judiciary Committee for six years. During that whole period of time bills seeking to deprive the courts of this power have been pending before that committee. Extensive hearings have been given to those favoring this legislation as well as to those opposing it. Frequent demands have been made by the committee of those making these assertions to produce the evidence before the committee to substantiate them. A few cases were presented, and an analysis of them utterly failed to establish the truth of the assertions. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the use of the injunction by the Federal courts is rarely resorted to. A careful examination of the records of the courts shows that from 1903 to 1912 only 25 injunctions were granted by the courts in labor cases, against 447 in other cases in which no complaint of any kind was ever made, and an analysis of the 25 cases in labor disputes demonstrates the fact that in every instance complete and impartial justice was done to both parties in the dispute. In the exceptional use of this great preventive writ, a writ absolutely essential to the administration of justice, mistakes may sometimes have been made, as they have been made and will be made in the future in every field of human instrumentality, but the declaration upon which the necessity for this drastic legislation is based is not true and therefore has not been proven.

It is true that a few men in the history of the Government have been punished by imprisonment for contempt of court for disobedience of the orders of the court in injunctive proceedings, and it is true that sometimes the acts complained of—acts which were employed in the violation of the injunction of the court—have been crimes, but no man familiar with judicial decisions and with the laws as administered by the courts would dare declare that the punishment for contempts for violation of the orders of the court have been made an instrumentality for the punishment of crimes. These crimes were a violation of State statutes, over which the Federal courts had no jurisdiction, and the fact that the violation of the order of the court for which the punishment for contempt was inflicted incidentally involved a crime against the State authorities is made the pretext for formulating these monstrous and false accusations against the courts of the United States. The whole argument to which I have referred is in effect an attempt to declare that the power of the court to protect the rights of the citizens of this country by the use of injunction should be denied and destroyed in certain classes of cases; that the efficacy of the courts to protect civil and property rights by the strong arm of equity should be curbed and restrained; and in this connection, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to a statement made upon this subject by Justice Brewer of the Supreme Court of the United States in a public address made in Brooklyn in November, 1909:

> Government by injunction has been an object of easy denunciation. So far from restricting this power, there never was a time when its restricted and vigorous exercise was worth more to the Nation and for the best interests of all. As population becomes more dense, as business interests multiply and crowd each other, the restraining power of a court of equity is of far greater importance than the punishing power of a court of criminal law.
> The best scientific thought of the day is along the lines of prevention rather than those of cure. We aim to stay the spread of epidemics rather than permit them to run their course, and attend solely to the work of curing the sick. And shall it be said of the law, which claims to be the perfection of reason and to express the highest thought of the day, that it no longer aims to prevent the wrong, but limits its action to the matter of punishment?
> To take away the equitable power of restraining wrong is a step backward toward barbarism rather than forward toward a higher civilization. * * * Courts make mistakes in granting injunctions. So they do in other orders and decrees. Shall the judicial power be taken away because of their occasional mistakes? The argument would lead to the total abolition of the judicial function.

This is the publicly expressed opinion of one of the greatest and most conservative Supreme Court justices that has ever adorned the bench. It is a brief but exhaustive summary of the efficacy and necessity of the writ of injunction, and completely answers all of the populistic declarations of interested parties that for political reasons are urging its destruction.

But, Mr. Speaker, I must pass from the consideration of these great questions and direct my attention entirely to the consideration of the bill before us. This bill is known as H. R. 23635 and was reported to the House on April 26, 1912, by a majority report made by Mr. CLAYTON, chairman of the committee, and a minority report in opposition to it representing practically the unanimous views of the minority, which was filed on May 3, 1912.

The bill itself seeks to accomplish two purposes. It first amends section 263 of the Judicial Code by substituting therefor the provisions of section 263 as provided in the pending bill. It then proceeds to amend section 266 of the Judicial Code by adding thereto sections 266a, 266b, and 266c.

The alleged scope of the bill is therefore to regulate the granting of injunctions. The power to grant injunctions is inherent in courts of equitable jurisdiction. The power is not possessed by all courts, but is an incident only of chancery jurisdiction and can be exercised only by courts clothed with that power or by legislative authorization. It is power possessed by the courts of the United States and is derived from the Constitution of the United States, which by section 2 of Article III provides:

The judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases in law or in equity arising under the Constitution. * * *

This inherent power of the Federal courts to protect all of the citizens of the United States in the enjoyment of all of the rights secured to them by the Constitution is therefore not bestowed by Congress, but is derived from the same high source that Congress derives its power to exercise the function of legislation.

Injunction is and always has been an extraordinary remedy to protect constitutional rights from invasion; it is preventive rather than remedial, and it can only be employed by the courts or the judges when it is necessary to prevent irreparable injury and when the complainant has no adequate remedy at law.

These two conditions must exist before any judge will grant an injunction. Every lawyer before me knows that this is elementary textbook law and that it is embodied in our jurisdiction by an unbroken line of judicial decisions. But when these conditions do exist, and when they are made known to the court or a judge by a proper presentation of facts, then the Federal power conferred upon our Federal courts by the Constitution of the United States in equity clothes them with a fundamental, organic, and inalienable power of protection which it is not within the power of Congress to destroy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after these general observations, I will proceed to a consideration of the bill before us, and I shall direct my attention first to the proposed substitution of section 263 of the bill for section 263 of the existing judicial code, and in doing this a few words of explanation respecting the origin of the proposed substituted section will be necessary. And this in turn requires a brief explanation of the history of congressional legislation upon the subject of injunctions.

The original judiciary act of 1789 made no specific provisions for the granting of injunctions, but by a general provision in that act power was given to the courts to permit special writs to meet special exigencies, and whatever injunctions were issued prior to that time were based upon this section of the judicial act; but on March 2, 1793, a specific act relating to injunctions was passed by Congress, which is as follows:

No injunction shall be granted in any case without reasonable previous notice to the adverse party or his attorney of the time and place of moving for the same.

This act continued in force until 1872, when the existing law upon that subject was passed. This act was carried into the recent judicial code of 1911 and now stands as section 263 of that code and is one of the sections that it is proposed to amend by the pending bill, or by the first section thereof. Mr. Speaker, from the earliest days of the Government down to 1872, notwithstanding the fact that the act of 1793 prohibited the granting of an injunction without notice to the adverse party or his attorney, restraining orders were constantly used by the courts without notice whenever the exigencies of the case required it. Following the earlier practice of the English courts, the distinction between restraining orders and injunctions was clearly recognized by the Federal courts. The statement of the majority of the committee in their report that the "will of Congress as thus expressed was completely thwarted and the statute nullified by the peculiar construction placed upon it by the courts" is wholly without foundation in fact. This clearly recognized distinctive and necessary discrimination was acquiesced in by the entire bar of the country, and one of the earliest cases arising under the act of 1793 arose in my own city of Philadelphia before a court presided over by Justice Wilson of the Supreme Court, who had himself been one of the most active and influential men in the framing of the Constitution; and it is a curious historical fact that the case was heard in a room in the old statehouse adjoining that in which the Constitution of the United States had but a few years before been adopted. The case is the one reported in 2 Dallas, page 360, Schermerhorn v. L'Espenasse, in which a restraining order was issued to prevent the defendant from transferring a very large amount of the certificates of the bonded indebtedness of the United States, or receiving the principal or interest thereon, in violation of an agreement transferring the right to the same to the plaintiff Schermerhorn. In this early case, as I have before stated, the restraining order was issued without notice and was acquiesced in by Mr. Lewis, attorney for the defendant, then one of the leading lawyers in the country, who stated to the court that he understood that in this case and in a large number of other cases, an injunction must be issued before a subpœna was served, as there were various cases in which justice could not otherwise be obtained.

This practice, Mr. Speaker, of issuing restraining orders without notice, I repeat, was continued from the time of the passage of the act of 1793 down to the present time. Even Chief Justice Marshall, while sitting in circuit, granted such orders to prevent irreparable mischief where there was no adequate remedy at law; and it was universally recognized by the courts and by the bar that whenever a case was presented to a chancellor, where the plaintiff was without adequate protection of law, and where the injury sought to be restrained was irreparable, and where the giving of notice to the defendant to make the application might of itself be productive of the mischief apprehended by inducing the defendant to accelerate the act in order that it might be complete before the time for making the application had arrived, the chancellor must of necessity stretch forth the strong right arm of equity to prevent the mischief; and that that power was inherent and organic and derived from the Constitution of the United States which vested the courts with equitable power and was beyond the power of Congress to deny or defeat.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that such was the state of the law until 1872, when the present law, known as the Carpenter Act, was passed, which repealed the act of 1793 and became thereafter the Federal law upon the subject of injunctions. This law is also very brief.

SEC. 718 (now section 263 of the Revised Judicial Code). Whenever notice is given of a motion for an injunction out of a circuit or district court, the court or judge thereof may, if there appears to be danger of irreparable injury from delay, grant an order restraining the act sought to be enjoined until the decision upon the motion, and such order may be granted with or without security, in the discretion of the court or judge.

It will be observed that a rigid interpretation of the language of section 718 would require that the granting of a restraining order by the courts must be preceded by a notice to the defendant of the granting of a writ of injunction. This was not the intention of the legislators, nor was that construction ever placed upon it by the courts. At the time of the passage of this act in the Senate in 1872 the author of the bill, Mr. Carpenter, publicly declared in his argument that his understanding of the powers of the courts to issue restraining orders in special cases could not be controlled by Congress, and this statement was acquiesced in by those who opposed the bill; and I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that in all decisions rendered by the courts since that time down to the present the inherent right of the court to grant a restraining order without notice to prevent irreparable mischief, when the exigencies of the case require it, was never denied nor disputed by the bar or bench of the country, and the courts continued to exercise this power to grant restraining orders without notice in a few cases where it was absolutely essential to protect civil and property rights.

But, Mr. Speaker, in recent years certain agitators attempted to foment public discontent among the masses by charging the courts with a violation of the strict letter of the law. The agitation and the declarations of these promoters were entirely unjustifiable, but the allegations were widely disseminated and resulted in occasional resentful denunciations of judges and courts of what was alleged to be an unwarranted abuse of judicial power.

President Taft, in his message to Congress of December, 1909, made the following recommendation:

I recommend that in compliance with the promise thus made—referring to the platform of the Republican convention of 1908—appropriate legislation be adopted. The ends of justice will best be met and the chief cause of complaint against ill-considered injunctions without notice will be removed by the enactment of a statute forbidding hereafter the issuing of any injunction or restraining order, whether temporary or permanent, by any Federal court without previous notice and a reasonable opportunity to be heard on behalf of the parties to be enjoined; unless it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court that the delay necessary to give such notice and hearing would result in irreparable injury to the complainant, and unless, also, the court shall from the evidence make a written finding, which shall be spread upon the court minutes, that immediate and irreparable injury is likely to ensue to the complainant, and shall define the injury, state why it is irreparable, and shall also indorse on the order issued the date and the hour of the issuance of the order. Moreover, every such injunction or restraining order issued without previous notice and opportunity by the defendant to be heard should by force of the statute expire and be of no effect after seven days from the issuance thereof or within any time less than that period which the court may fix, unless within such seven days or such less period the injunction or order is extended or renewed after previous notice and opportunity to be heard.

My judgment is that the passage of such an act, which really embodies the best practice in equity, and is very likely the rule now in force in some courts, will prevent the issuing of ill-advised orders of injunction without notice and will render such orders, when issued, much less objectionable by the short time in which they may remain effective.

After the receipt of this message, as I was at that time engaged on the subject of the revision of the judicial title of the Federal statutes, I took the matter up forthwith and prepared a bill which I submitted to the President, and he gave it his hearty and unqualified approval. This bill was widely published throughout the country with the President's statement that he approved fully of all of its provisions and that he hoped it would be passed by Congress without any alteration, amendment, or change whatever. This bill was introduced in the Sixty-first Congress, was referred to the Judiciary Committee, but has never been reported therefrom.

This bill was again introduced in the present Congress, and was proposed in committee as a substitute for the pending bill, and under the provisions of the rule under which this present discussion is proceeding, will be offered to the House by the Republican Members as a substitute for the same.

This bill, then, introduced by a Republican Member and indorsed by President Taft, represents, I believe, the attitude of our party upon the subject of congressional regulation of injunctions.

It is substantially section 263 of the proposed bill with one single exception, to which I shall allude hereafter. It does not in any material respect change the existing law with regard to injunctions. It merely clothes the court with the legal right to issue restraining orders, without notice, without resorting to the exercise of its inherent equitable powers to do so. It defines the requisites that must appear to the court as a ground for issuing the restraining order without notice. It requires the day of the issuance of the order to be indorsed upon it and requires the reason for its being granted without notice to be spread at large upon the record. It requires by law the complainant to be reasonably vigilant in maintaining his right to the remedy he has invoked. In other words, it embodies in concrete legal form the actual practice of the judges of the Federal courts, almost invariably pursued by them, in the granting of injunctions, and does eliminate the danger of all ill-considered and injudicious restraints, and erects an impregnable bulwark against the widely disseminated, resentful, but unwarranted, denunciations of the courts and judges.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that this is, I believe, the attitude of the Republican Party upon this subject; a willingness that they have at all times shown to assent to any rational proposal to properly safeguard the issuance of injunctions against even the possibility of abuse. I repeat, in order that it may be distinctly understood, that this proposal is indorsed by the Democratic members of this committee by their proposal in this bill to amend section 263 by this literal transcript of the Moon bill, with the exception before alluded to.

The minority members therefore practically support this section, as before stated, and will, at the proper time, move to substitute that section, slightly amended, for the proposed bill and will ask the House to join them in that proposition.

Now, the only material difference between the Moon bill and section 263 of the pending bill, to which I desire now to call your special attention, is that the Moon bill provides that the restraining order issued without notice shall expire seven days after it is served upon the defendants. Section 263 provides that it shall expire not more than seven days after it is entered. That is the vital distinction, and it is vital.

Why, a restraining order is of no vitality until it is served; it is as inocuous as the paper on which it is written. It has no force, it is not in existence as far as it has any effect, as long as it is in the pocket of the officer or in the archives of the court. It is a harmless and inocuous paper itself. Its vitality only comes into existence the moment it is served, and if you are going to make a restraining order expire seven days after the entry, the way to let an order expire is to evade the service and get outside the jurisdiction of the court. Therefore, when any person has an idea that a restraining order is to be issued he may get out of the way and thus evade it. That is the vital distinction between the two.

They point out the fact that the President recommended that it should expire seven days after entry. They point out the fact that the Clayton bill itself embodied the recommendation of the President. I shall not attempt to state conversation between myself and the President, but I prepared this bill containing this vital distinction. It was submitted to the President. He examined it carefully and gave out to the country the statement that he approved every word of that bill and hoped that it would forthwith be passed by Congress.

Therefore the inference is irresistible that in that particular point, when the President's attention was called to it, he approved without qualification this change from his original recommendation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I resume my discussion of the other section of this bill. This section is defective only in the respect of which I have spoken, and all that needs to be corrected is in that one essential particular, and then it would be good law. I want to repeat before I leave it, that this provision introduces nothing new in the law, but simply embodies in a statutory form the exact practice of all the Federal judges in granting injunctions.

I now pass to a consideration of the other sections of this bill, and desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that they are designed as amendments to a different section of the judicial code. They propose three additional sections to be added to section 266 of that code. They are numbered in order as section 266a, section 266b, and section 266c, and they are intended as new substantive provisions of law. What is section 266? It is not the general law relating to injunctions. Two hundred and sixty-six is what is known as the Overman bill. When we passed the Interstate Commerce Act, which, among other things, provided for the Commerce Court, there was great agitation about the Federal courts restraining the operation of a State law. There was an effort made to absolutely prohibit the Federal courts from prohibiting the operations of a State law. That was discovered to be absolutely unconstitutional. Under the fourteenth amendment, the States were absolutely prohibited from depriving people of the equal protection of the law, and therefore whenever a State statute did that the United States courts must perforce have jurisdiction and restrain it. What did we do? We said by section 266 that whenever the application was made to the Federal courts to restrain the operations of a State law one judge could not grant an injunction, that there must be three judges sitting and one of them must be either a supreme court justice or a circuit court judge. That is the law to-day, that is all. It is a regulation of injunctive power that is within the power of Congress. Now, this bill seeks to add three new sections to that. One of them, section 266a, which at length says that no restraining order shall issue except upon the giving of security. Well, I have not any objection to that. I want to say that is nothing but an unnecessary reflection upon the fairness of the chancellors of the United States. No single instance to establish its necessity ever was even hinted at before the committee. I have never heard a statement in all this agitation that any court has failed to perform its duty in that respect. The act of 1872, now section 263, gives discretion to do or not to do it. No living man ever made a statement before our committee or anywhere else that the court had not always required security when it was necessary; therefore this section is an unnecessary reflection against the judges; but it is all right; I do not object to it.

The next one is 266b, and let me call attention to that for a few minutes. It says:

That every order of injunction or restraining order shall set forth the reasons for the issuance of the same, shall be specific in terms, and shall describe in reasonable detail, and not by reference to the bill of complaint or other document, the act or acts sought to be restrained.

And it also further provides, and this is to me the dangerous part of it:

And shall be binding only upon the parties to the suit, their agents, servants, employees, and attorneys or those in active concert with them, and who shall by personal service or otherwise have received actual notice of the same.

First of all, the issuance of injunction and the requisites of an injunction are essentially regulated by the equity rules of the United States courts. It has been said, indeed, in the majority report, that there is no law to-day requiring any particular form for an injunction. Our equity practice for nearly 60 years has been regulated by enacting a few fundamental principles and then leaving all the details of the practice to the rules of the Supreme Court of the United States. These rules and regulations have, therefore, the authority of law. Every lawyer here who practices in a supreme court knows that. The Supreme Court rules prescribe the essentials of an injunction. No judge draws an injunctive order to suit his own will or his own caprice. Therefore every single order is regulated by law to-day. Now, I call attention of the majority side of this House to the fact that these rules forbid in an injunctive order unnecessary recitals. The object of every injunctive order is to make clear what the parties restrained have to do or what they must not do. Any injunctive order that does not do that so clear that the wayfaring man, though a fool, could not err therein, can not be held and never has been held to be properly drawn or to be of any legal force or effect, but these rules do say that a man shall not restate in that order the recitals of the bill; that you must state what the man must or must not do. Why, you confuse any man by making a restraining order if you do not do that. The existing practice absolutely requires that everything shall not go in. Now, bear in mind the uselessness of this provision. The first section already provides—that is one of the things provided in section 263; one of the things recommended by the President—that the judge when he grants the restraining order without notice should write in the record the kind of injury he was going to guard against and say why it was irreparable and why he granted it without notice. That is already provided for to be entered in the record of the court. Now, why provide for a useless repetition in the injunctive order of the court when it can only confuse the person sought to be restrained? Now I propose to pass very briefly upon the next paragraph of this section, as there are other gentlemen who will speak about it. I refer to the paragraph which limits the persons to be bound by the injunction. The gentleman from Illinois, in his query to the chairman of the committee, indicated by his question what everybody here has in mind—that the object of this bill plainly is intended to limit the scope of the injunction to somebody named in it or somebody known to the complainant at the time it is issued; somebody who at some time happens to be in active concert with them. But, Mr. Speaker, the intention of the injunction is to restrain an irreparable injury, to restrain an injury that can not be compensated for by law, to restrain every person under all conditions and under all circumstances that can be reached by a court of equity from doing the thing prohibited. Now, under the attempt to limit it by this legislation to known persons, or to persons in active concert with them, you are going to minimize, to narrow, and, in some instances, to destroy that power.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to say that I have in my hand the rules of practice in equity. Will the gentleman point out the rule which he says controls the practice in the issuance of injunctions by courts?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I can not do so, my time is limited and I can not be interrupted to do that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Can the gentleman even state the number of the rule?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. No; I can not do that. But I am absolutely convinced of the fact that it is provided for in the rules of the court. The gentleman knows it as well as I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. I deny absolutely the statement the gentleman has made, and for that reason offer him the rules, so that he can present the rule he refers to to this House.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. The rules do not say what an injunction shall——

Mr. SHERLEY. That does not answer the question that the rules of the Supreme Court declare exactly what an injunction shall contain.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. They do so essentially but not in detail; but to return to the subject that I was discussing at the time of the interruption, I was endeavoring to show that there are many conditions under which men who are not parties, who are not agents, who are not in active concert with defendant, might, even with the notice of the restraining order, commit every act of irreparable mischief that order sought to prevent. Now, the only excuse for this provision is this. The only consequence inflicted upon a man who disobeys a mandate of a court in equity is punishment by contempt. Of course everybody recognizes that. Many men in times of excitement would not hesitate for a moment to openly, flagrantly, or defiantly violate court injunction but for the fear of that punishment. Now, the invariable rule, established by the Supreme Court, a rule of invariable application, is that no man can be punished for contempt for the violation of an injunctive order, who did not have a real, substantial, or accurate notice of the existence of that order and of the fact that he was purposely violating it. Therefore your effort to limit it to an enumerated number of people is exceedingly dangerous, and would permit the commission of many offenses by men who could not be named, and who could not be shown to be in active concert with those who are named, and is absolutely unnecessary, because the court can not punish them for contempt until they have actual notice.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the next section is the one to which I desire to call the particular attention of the House, namely, section 266c, which is as follows. If you gentlemen have not the bill before you, I beg to ask you to consider it carefully while I hastily read the section. Here we come to the real meat in this bill, here we come to its sinister motives, here we come to the introduction of a danger that requires and demands our most careful scrutiny.

SEC. 266c. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law.

Now, that seems absolutely harmless. You would say, on the face of it, "Mr. MOON, that is existing law." I say, if it is existing law, why do we want to do the futile and foolish thing of exposing ourselves to the ridicule of the courts by enacting existing law? Everybody will say, "Why, an injunction can not issue in any case except where there is no adequate remedy at law." That is true. An injunction can not issue in any case except to prevent an irreparable injury. That is true. I have textbook authorities here, which I will not take time to read. Every tyro and student of law in his first year knows that. He knows when you talk about an injunction its authorization requires two absolutely essential prerequisites, the first one of which is that there must be no adequate remedy at law, and, secondly, that the mischief must be irreparable. In other words, the injunction does not come into existence until ordinary legal means have become useless for protection. Why, the intervention of equitable protection is wholly dependent on the fact that a man has no adequate remedy at law. Now, therefore, you say and I say, why is it necessary to declare that in labor disputes a complaint shall not be entitled to a writ of injunction except to prevent irreparable mischief and when there is no adequate remedy at law, when that is already the law now in every case?

Ah, Mr. Speaker, the sinister object of that is found in another clause. It is found in the definition of the rights that are to be the subject of injunctive protection; you will find that in this particular class of cases—labor cases—that the injunction shall issue only to protect property and property rights. I want to pause there to make it clear. Every other right known to the law—civil rights, personal rights, political rights—will be absolutely beyond the power of protective relief in labor disputes. Now, understand that the definition given of injunctions by every standard authority—and I have them here and will put them in the RECORD, but will not take time to read them now, but nobody will contradict them—the definition given of the rights that the injunctive process is intended to protect are civil and property rights. This bill contains the sinister limitation in this particular class of cases of the protection of the injunctive process to property and property rights only.

Now, let me make that clear. Do not, gentlemen, get into your minds and say, "Oh, well, it only takes away the power to protect by injunction these civil, personal, or political rights. It leaves for them all the protection of the common law and the common-law courts. It simply strikes down the power to protect by injunction these great rights." Nothing of the kind. Do not be deceived. Understand that no injunction can issue in any case as long as there is legal protection for any rights; no injunction can issue as long as the damages to those rights are susceptible of calculation. No injunction can issue in these cases or in any cases until the protection afforded by the common law has broken down and is inapplicable. Therefore this limitation to property rights does not begin until there is no other protection left except the equitable protection. That is, in other words, by striking down equitable protection in labor disputes to civil rights and personal rights and political rights you take away all the protection they have under the Constitution.

Let me restate it. They could not come into equity at all until they had not any adequate remedy at law. They can not get into equity until their damages are irreparable. That is hornbook law. Therefore, for the protection of all rights except property rights in a labor dispute, every power under the Constitution and the law is absolutely swept away, except the power to punish for crime.

Mr. Speaker, the result is obvious. If you pass this bill, you denude the citizens of the United States of every vestige of protection under the Constitution and laws of the land as soon as their rights are involved by a labor dispute, except as to the protection of property rights. Suppose some of your constituents desire to go into industrial pursuits. They buy a piece of land to build a factory, and in so doing they are protected by the Constitution and the law and the equity power of the courts in all the rights that they possess as to property, civil, personal, and political. They buy bricks to build that factory, and they buy the machinery to put into it, and in all of these transactions they do not denude themselves of legal or equitable protection at all. The full power of the Constitution and the laws of the land are open to them in a court of equity for protection. But the moment they employ labor to operate that industry, under this bill, that very moment they denude themselves of the protection of the Constitution of the United States, and the laws passed in pursuance thereof, to everything except their property rights.

Gentlemen, I am going to stop to tell you that that is absolutely unconstitutional. You can not do it. Would you do it if you could? You are going to create a class here that has greater rights or less rights under the law than the rest of the people. The class thus attempted to be exempted from the operation of the general law is the labor class and all other persons involved in labor contracts. Do you realize the extent to which contracts growing out of labor affect our life? Why, it was stated before our committee that there are 30,000,000 people in this country engaged in gainful occupations. It seemed to me like an overstatement, but the witness declared his ability to verify it. Why, gentlemen, our material greatness, our stupendous importance in the eyes of the world, and our national leadership in commerce and finance have been gained by our prominence as an industrial nation, and it is safe to say that three-fourths of our vast population have many diverse interests that are affected in vital ways by labor contracts or by questions affecting labor relations; and in this industrial Nation is it wise to say that three-fourths of our people shall be deprived of protection except for property rights?

Even though you should regard it wise, you can not do it, because it is unconstitutional. One of the primal objects of that Constitution was to secure to all men at all times the equal protection of the law, to prevent the creation of class distinctions. This has been so frequently declared by the courts that citation of authority is unnecessary, but let me read you what Justice Field said about the equal protection of the laws, this constitutional guaranty secured to all of the people. Let me tell you what he said about what every law must do and what all are entitled to.

In the case of County of Santa Clara v. Railroad Co., in Eighteenth Federal Reporter, speaking of this subject, he said:

> And by equal protection is meant equal security to everyone to his private rights—in his right to life, to liberty, to property, and to the pursuit of happiness. It implies not only that the means which the laws afford for such security shall be equally accessible to him, but that no one shall be subject to any greater burdens or charges than such as are imposed upon all others under like circumstances. This protection attends everyone everywhere, whatever be his position in society or his association with others, either for profit, improvement, or pleasure. It does not leave him because of any social or official position which he may hold, nor because he may belong to a political body or to a religious society or be a member of a commercial, manufacturing, or transportation company. It is the shield which the arm of our blessed Government holds at all times over everyone—man, woman, and child—in all of its broad domain, wherever they may go or in whatever relations they may be placed.

That is the idea of the equal protection of the law that is evidenced by a great justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Why, Mr. Speaker, every act that has ever been attempted to be passed by a State to deprive the people of the equal protection of laws has been declared unconstitutional. I recall one in the State of Illinois—a leading case upon the subject, reported in 184 United States, page 540—entitled Connelly v. The Union Sewer Pipe Co.

The State of Illinois had passed one of the most sweeping antitrust acts ever passed by any State. It not only attempted to prevent combinations which sought to restrict prices, and not only made such a combination a criminal act, but it provided, further, that no suit at law to recover for the price of goods manufactured and sold in violation of the statute could be maintained. The defendants refused to pay for pipe that had been bought, on the ground that they were manufactured and sold in violation of the provision of this act. Section 9 of the act was as follows:

> The provisions of this act shall not apply to agricultural products or live stock while in the hands of the producer and raiser.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in a vigorous opinion delivered by Justice Harlan, declared the act unconstitutional because it denied to persons within the jurisdiction of the court the equal protection of the laws, in violation of the fourteenth amendment. The language of the court upon this subject is as follows:

> The fourteenth amendment, in declaring that no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, undoubtedly intended that there should be no arbitrary deprivation of life or liberty, or arbitrary spoliation of property, but that equal protection and security should be given to all under like circumstances in the enjoyment of their personal and civil rights; that all persons should be equally entitled to pursue their happiness and acquire and enjoy property; that they should have like access to the courts of the country for the protection of their persons and property, the prevention and redress of wrongs, and the enforcement of contracts; that no impediment should be interposed to the pursuits of anyone except as applied to the same pursuits by others under like circumstances; that no greater burdens should be laid upon one than are laid upon others.

The similarity, Mr. Speaker, between the proposed provision of the pending bill, destroying equitable protection for essential rights to a large and distinctive class of our citizens and the Illinois antitrust act, which exempted from its provision certain classes of contracts, must be obvious and apparent to all, and the language of Justice Harlan declaring that act unconstitutional is in every essential principle equally applicable to the act we are asked to pass by the adoption of the present bill.

It is true that the cases which I have cited arose under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, which is a prohibition upon the States to enact legislation depriving the citizens of the States of the equal protection of the law; but it is universally conceded by all lawyers and men familiar with the trend of judicial decisions that the prohibition of the fifth amendment to the Constitution, which is a limitation upon the power of Congress to pass any act which shall deprive the citizens of the United States of life, liberty, and property without due process of law, is the exact equivalent of the fourteenth amendment; that, in other words, Congress has no greater constitutional right to deprive the citizens of the United States of the equal protection of the laws of the land under the salutary provisions of the fifth amendment to the Constitution than have the respective States the right to deny the same equal protection of the law to their own citizens under the provisions of the fourteenth amendment. While this particular point has never yet come before the Supreme Court for final decision, because Congress has never heretofore attempted to deprive our citizens of that equal protection, yet it has been established by analogy and will not be doubted or disputed by any lawyer upon the floor of this House.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman to ask him what case he is referring to?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. From Connelly v. The Union Sewer Pipe Co., One hundred and eighty-four United States Reports.

Mr. CLAYTON. I thought he was reading from the well-known foundry case. I thought the gentleman was in search of the truth and I thought I saw evidence of the light of truth breaking in on him [laughter], and I wanted to give him the whole light.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I have read to the gentleman from the opinions of the Supreme Court, to which I go for all interpretation of principles, and in the light of which I stand, and which I think will utterly and absolutely condemn the spirit of this bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is a very great undertaking in this Congress.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I am willing to assume that obligation, but I would not have proposed it if the gentleman had not interrupted me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes more to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON] is extended 15 minutes.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, again I am reminded of the limitation of my time, and I must hurriedly pass to the last section of the bill. Gentlemen, the first paragraph of section 266c is vicious, dangerous, and unconstitutional, as I have shown you, but the next is worse, if possible. Let me call your attention now to the second paragraph of that section. It is as follows:

> And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works, or carries on business, or happens to be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working; or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute; or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value; or from peaceably assembling at any place in a lawful manner and for lawful purposes; or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto.

This hurried analysis I have given of the first paragraph of section 266c has, I trust, aroused your fears to the danger of such legislation and to its apparent unconstitutionality. But some of the more optimistic of you may say, "Well, at all events, even though we are denied the equal protection of the law, and even though we are denied the protection to our civil, political, and personal rights by that section, yet, thank God, we have our property rights protected." Oh, no, gentlemen, do not delude yourselves with any such false hope. Read this next paragraph and you will find that in a great multitude of important cases, when the citizens of the United States are in vital need of equitable protection, the courts are absolutely deprived of their power to protect even property rights. It says that in the protection of property rights certain enumerated acts shall never be enjoined. Do you catch the significance of that? I ask you to observe that those acts thus protected are every one of them successive steps in every strike, every boycott, every lockout that has ever been devised. They separate those acts and segregate them and place them separately beyond the power of the court to enjoin for any purpose; they enumerate a number which no court would ever think of enjoining independently, but they give each, step by step, until they enumerate in their successive order every single implement that has been employed by the cruelest, most tyrannical, most brutal, and most dangerous strikes and boycotts that human ingenuity has ever invented.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the first paragraph of section 266c strikes down the power of our courts to protect in labor disputes any rights but the rights of property, and the second paragraph of that section, the paragraph we are now considering, strikes down absolutely the power of the courts to protect even property rights, when that protection requires them to restrain by injunction the performance of certain enumerated acts by men engaged in labor disputes, acts many of which are innocent in themselves and which no court would even independently enjoin, but which in combination have been and may at any time again become the most dangerous and destructive weapons of unlawful industrial warfare.

Permit me again, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the House to the fact that while this section only professes to deprive us of the right of equitable protection by injunction to all of our rights in labor disputes, yet to deprive us of this protection is to deprive us of all protection guaranteed by the Constitution, because the right to equitable protection does not begin until the power of the law to protect us is inadequate and impossible.

The obvious purpose of this paragraph, Mr. Speaker, is to legalize the modern strike and secondary boycott as instruments of industrial warfare, and to place the destructive machinery of these dangerous and cunningly devised weapons beyond the preventive power of our courts of justice.

Mr. Speaker, the right of men singly or in combination to strike for the purpose of increasing their wages, for bettering their condition, or for any other legal purpose; the right of men to refuse for any reason to work for another or to deal with him in any way, is one of the highest and most sacred rights known to the law. It is a right that is at all times entitled to the absolute protection of courts of justice, and no court and no judge in the land would withhold that protection. It has been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States to be a personal and a property right guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States.

But, Mr. Speaker, every man acquainted with modern labor disputes knows that many organized strikes are not limited in their purpose or their conduct to a securing of those rights.

Mr. Speaker, the strike as an instrument in labor disputes assumes in its progress innumerable forms, but certain features are common to all of them. Various attempts have been made to define them. Some eminent authorities have gone so far as to say that a peaceful strike has never been conducted, that it is impossible, that in its very nature it aims at unlawful coercion of employees and of men seeking employment. A very fair and conservative analysis of the ordinary features of a strike is contained in the following statement gleaned from Federal decisions:

> A strike is properly defined as a simultaneous cessation of work on the part of the workmen, and its legality or illegality much depends upon the means by which it is enforced and on its objects. It may be criminal or it may be part of a combination for the purpose of injuring or molesting either masters or men; or it may be simply illegal, as if it be the result of an agreement depriving those engaged in it of their liberty of action; or it may be perfectly innocent, as if it be the result of the voluntary combination of the men for the purpose only of benefiting themselves by raising their wages, or for other lawful purposes.
> In every case the questions involved are—is it an innocent strike or is it a combination designed to cripple the employer's property, to obstruct him in the operation of his business, to interfere with other employees who do not wish to quit, or to prevent by intimidation or other wrongful modes or by any device the employment of others to take the place of those quitting, and not such as were the result of the exercise by employees in peaceable ways of rights clearly belonging to them and not designed to injure or embarrass others or to interfere with the actual possession and management of the property of the employer.
> Any combination to interfere with the perfect freedom in the proper management of one's lawful business, to dictate the terms upon which such business shall be conducted by means of interference with property or with the lawful employment of others, are necessarily within the condemnation of the law.

It will be observed that while recognizing the existence of lawful striking combinations and clearly defining their entire legality for certain purposes, the court in these cases denounces as unlawful a combination designed to cripple the employer's property, to obstruct him in the operation of his business, to interfere with other employees who do not wish to quit, or to prevent by intimidation or other unlawful modes or by any device the employment of others to take the places of those quitting, or to interfere with the perfect freedom in the proper management of one's lawful business, and so forth.

These things, Mr. Speaker, are unlawful; they are beyond the protection of the ordinary processes of the law; they result in irreparable injury to property and property rights; they invade the personal and civil rights of many men; and they must be protected by a court of equity by the use of the injunction. Can any man for one moment seriously doubt that the acts enumerated in this section—acts intended hereby to be made absolutely immune from equitable protection or prevention—are acts intended to accomplish one or all of these illegal or inequitable objects? They are the very acts that have always been employed for this purpose; they are the successive steps of an illegal combination for an illegal purpose, and to simply label them as peaceful does not change their character or their effect. They are the elemental factors in every common-law conspiracy in labor disputes, and their organization and consummation creates in the most absolute sense a conspiracy in restraint of trade.

But, Mr. Speaker, my limited times does not permit me to give detailed illustrations of the dangerous and illegal acts that would be protected by the immunity from equitable relief guaranteed to a special class of our citizens by this paragraph. It would not only have prevented the courts in the past from preventing by injunction dangerous and destructive strikes that have menaced the peace and prosperity of our country, but would completely disarm them of all power to prevent the secondary boycott, which is conceded by all persons familiar with the subject to be the most brutal, despotic, and destructive power ever conceived by the ingenuity of man—an engine of oppression so dangerous that to strike down the power of the court to prevent it is the most dangerous limitation of power that it is possible to conceive.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, the provisions of this paragraph are dangerous and void. If passed by this House, and if it should become a law, I confidently venture the prediction that the trial courts of the land will be obliged to disregard it when it is attempted to be used as an instrument to inflict irreparable injury, and that the Supreme Court of the United States will declare it a usurpation of power by Congress.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is open to other fatal objections. Like the previous sections, it denies the equal protection of the laws; it is in the interest of certain classes, and, in addition to this, it is unconstitutional and impossible because it makes the protection of rights depend upon the character of the controversy and upon the sanctity of certain acts of the persons concerned therein and not upon the character and quality of the rights involved. In this respect it is a novelty in legislative history. Constitutions are created to protect human rights. Legislatures are organized to pass acts commending that which is right and prohibiting that which is wrong. The office of constitutional governments, therefore, and the functions of legislative bodies are to secure rights and to prevent and punish wrongs; and to accomplish these purposes every human instrumentality that interferes with the enjoyment of rights or the prevention of wrongs is of necessity placed under the ban of the law without regard to its individual quality or to its apparently inocuous character.

Mr. Justice Holmes has declared in the case of Aiken v. Wisconsin (195 U. S., 194) that—

> No conduct has such an absolute privilege as to justify all possible schemes of which it may be a part. The most innocent and constitutionally protected of acts or omissions may be a step in a criminal plot, and if it is a step in a plot neither its innocence nor the Constitution is sufficient to prevent the punishment of the plot by law.

This paragraph boldly attempts to accomplish that purpose; to sanctify and place beyond the reach of the law certain specified acts of certain individuals, independent of any consideration of the plot or scheme of which these protected acts may be made a part. No matter if these acts, even though innocent in themselves, may become the successive steps in the destruction of the rights of the citizens of the United States, or may be made effective means in the infliction of dangerous and irreparable wrongs, they are attempted to be placed by this bill beyond the reach of judicial control, and therefore beyond the power of the Government to correct or to prevent. The legislative arm of the Government, therefore, deriving its sole power from the Constitution, could destroy by an act of Congress the very function which the Government was instituted to perform, namely, the protection of rights and the prevention and punishment of wrongs.

Why, Mr. Speaker, a great religious poet has heralded the millennium as the time when universal peace shall reign upon the earth, and has symbolized it by the beautiful figure of turning the sword into a plowshare and the spear into a pruning hook. The plowshare and the pruning hook have therefore, from time immemorial, become the symbols of peace, prosperity, and good will. They have been hallowed in song and in story as typical implements of the people of the ideal future. They are regarded everywhere to-day as the most harmless and peaceful implements of the most noble and honorable occupation known to man; but what would you think of an attempt to pass a law by Congress declaring that henceforth no act of any man if committed by a plowshare or a pruning hook should be prohibited or punished, and that these peculiarly sacred instruments should be placed absolutely beyond the regulative power of the law.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the purpose of paragraph 2 of section 266c of this bill, and since the time allotted to me has about expired I shall close my argument by demonstrating to this House that this very proposal has been declared beyond the power of Congress by one of the most recent cases upon a kindred subject that has received the attention of the Supreme Court. I refer to the case of Gompers v. The Buck Stove & Range Co., reported in Two hundred and twenty-first United States, page 418, which was decided by the Supreme Court only a few months ago.

In that case the court had issued an injunction restraining the defendants from boycotting the complainant or from publishing or otherwise making any statement that the Buck Stove & Range Co. was or had been on the "unfair" or "We don't patronize" list of the defendants.

The complainants contended that the injunction had been violated; that the speeches, editorials, and publications made by the several defendants at different times were intended to continue the boycott and to republish the fact that the complainant was on the unfair list. The defendant contended that the injunction was unlawful, because it was not within the power of the court to abridge the liberty of speech or the freedom of the press.

The court, in commenting upon this, said:

But if the contention be sound that no court can under any circumstances enjoin a boycott if spoken words or printed matter were used as one of the instrumentalities by which it was made effective, then it could not do so even if interstate commerce was restrained by means of a blacklist or printed device to accomplish its purpose. And this, too, notwithstanding that the law provides that where such commerce is unlawfully restrained, it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and enjoin the violation of the statute.

The court then added:

The court's protective and restraining powers extend to every device whereby property is irremediably damaged or commerce is illegally restrained. To hold that the restraint of trade under the Sherman Antitrust Act or the general principles of law, could be enjoined, but the means through which the restraint was accomplished could not be enjoined, would be to render the law impotent.

If the right of free speech and the freedom of the press, which have special guaranties and immunities under many State constitutions, can not be protected as a device or instrumentality to inflict injury upon the citizens of the country, how much less can the acts enumerated in this paragraph be placed beyond the law when they are attempted to be used for that purpose?

But, Mr. Speaker, I must close. I have attempted hastily to point out to you the features of this bill. I have referred at some length to what I regard its most dangerous provisions, and I will leave the matter with the House with the statement that no matter how many men be swayed from their loyalty to the Constitution and from their reverence and respect for the courts by popular demagogues or by newly invented devices for obtaining expressions of the popular will, I shall stand in opposition to any measure, coming from any source or indorsed by any party, that aims at the weakening of the power of our courts to protect to the utmost the right to enjoy our lives, our liberties, and our property under the full protection of the law. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a paper by Mr. James A. Emery on this subject.

APPENDIX.

STATEMENT OF JAMES A. EMERY, ESQ., OF WASHINGTON, D. C., COUNSEL FOR NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MANUFACTURERS.

Mr. EMERY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement made by the proposer of the bill H. R. 11032, that it is substantially the measure commonly known as the Pearre bill, considered in a former Committee on the Judiciary, I ask that the two bills be inserted at the beginning of my statement, first the Wilson bill (H. R. 11032), and secondly the Pearre bill, a copy of which I will furnish, in order that the committee may realize by comparison the very marked differences between these two measures.

WILSON BILL.

(62d Cong., 1st sess. H. R. 11032. House of Representatives, June 2, 1911.)

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed:

A bill to regulate the issuance of restraining orders and procedure thereon, and to limit the meaning of "conspiracy" in certain cases.

Be it enacted, etc., That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employee, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, or involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property and property right must be particularly described in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant, or by his, her, or its agent or attorney. And for the purposes of this act no right to continue the relation of employer and employee, or to assume or create such relation with any particular person or persons, or at all, or patronage or good will in business, or buying or selling commodities of any particular kind or at any particular place, or at all, shall be construed, held, considered, or treated as property or as constituting a property right.

SEC. 2. That in cases arising in the courts of the United States or coming before said courts, or before any judge or the judges thereof, no agreement between two or more persons concerning the terms or conditions of employment, or the assumption or creation or termination of any relation between employer and employee, or concerning any act or thing to be done or not to be done with reference to or involving or growing out of a labor dispute, shall constitute a conspiracy or other civil or criminal offense, or be punished or prosecuted, or damages recovered upon as such, unless the act or thing agreed to be done or not to be done would be unlawful if done by a single individual; nor shall the entering into or the carrying out of any such agreement be restrained or enjoined unless such act or thing agreed to be done would be subject to be restrained or enjoined under the provisions, limitations, and definitions contained in the first section of this act.

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

PEARRE BILL.

A bill to regulate the issuance of restraining orders and injunctions and procedure thereon and to limit the meaning of "conspiracy" in certain cases.

Be it enacted, etc., That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and an employee, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed to labor and persons seeking employment as laborers, or between persons seeking employment as laborers, or involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property or property right must be particularly described in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his, her, or its agent or attorney. And for the purposes of this act no right to continue the relation of employer and employee or to assume or create such relation with any particular person or persons, or at all, or to carry on business of any particular kind, or at any particular place, or at all, shall be construed, held, considered, or treated as property or as constituting a property right.

SEC. 2. That in cases in the courts of the United States or coming before said courts, or before any judge or the judges thereof, no agreement between two or more persons concerning the terms or conditions of employment of labor, or the assumption or creation or termination of any relation between employer and employee, or concerning any act or thing to be done or not to be done with reference to or involving or growing out of a labor dispute, shall constitute a conspiracy or other criminal offense or be punished or prosecuted as such unless the act or thing agreed to be done or not to be done would be unlawful if done by a single individual, nor shall the entering into or the carrying out of any such agreement be restrained or enjoined under the provisions, limitations, and definition contained in the first section of this act.

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

I have not, Mr. Chairman, the advantage of examining the record of discussion before this committee respecting this measure, but I did hear the proposer of the bill, Mr. WILSON, make a statement with reference to it at the last hearing of this committee.

I do not think that in the course of congressional legislation a more remarkable measure has been presented for the consideration of this committee. It is extraordinary not only for its admitted purposes, but for what it would actually effect through its provisions. The bill appears with the formal indorsement of the American Federation of Labor, and it is substantially declared that its object is to prevent the issuance of injunctions in trade disputes and to forbid the punishment of certain acts when done by labor combinations which the actors assert ought not, by their nature, to be restrained or punished, and toward which they allege the law is oppressive in its character and has been oppressively administered by Federal judges.

Under the usual circumstances of discussion, I should first of all ask the committee to consider what occasion there is for complaint of this character and whether or not it is true that the present practice of issuing injunctions against some acts occurring in labor disputes and threatening civil and property rights is oppressive in its nature, and whether or not it has been improperly administered.

But before I ask the committee to consider that, which is the crucial test of the present complaint, I ask your attention for the terms of the measure itself, that you may realize it subverts rights of the most fundamental nature and greatly modifies legislation that has stood upon the statute books of this country for years, thus affecting existing law far beyond, I believe, the intention of its proponent.

The first section of the bill provides that in any "case" between an employer and employee, or between employers and employees, or persons employed and persons seeking employment, or in any "case" involving or growing out of a labor dispute, no injunction shall be issued by a Federal court except to protect property or a property right threatened with irreparable injury for which there is no adequate remedy at law. The second part of the first section thereafter proceeds to declare that for the purpose of this bill no right to continue the relation of employer and employee, or to assume or create such relation, or the good will of the business, or buying and selling commodities of any particular kind or at any particular place or at all, shall be "construed, held, considered, or treated as property rights."

You will observe that the first section, Mr. Chairman, is not, as the committee might gather from the statements of its proponent, confined to persons engaged in a labor dispute. It applies to any case between an employer and employee arising in a Federal court respecting the employment relation or which involves or grows out of a labor dispute. Consequently it would, first of all, affect a class of cases frequently arising, not only under the laws of the United States or treaties but under the laws of the different States, where, on account of diversity of citizenship, a Federal court is administering the law of the State.

Mr. NORRIS. If I may be permitted to interrupt, I think Mr. Wilson, as I remember it, in arguing on this bill, claimed that the first section could not have that broad a construction. He contends that it is confined entirely to labor disputes.

Mr. EMERY. I concede, Mr. NORRIS, that that is the declaration of Mr. Wilson, and that is probably his intention; but that is not the language of the bill, and I leave it to you gentlemen.

Mr. DAVIS. The various clauses of the bill are joined by the conjunction "or."

Mr. EMERY (reading):

"That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employee, or between employers and employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, or involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment."

It must be manifest upon the face of it that in its terms it distinctly applies to any case respecting the relations enumerated that arises in a Federal court. It does not even say in civil cases but because of the fact that it is an attempt to modify the conditions under which a Federal injunction is to be issued it manifestly would apply only to an equitable proceeding. I need not take the time of this committee to call your attention, experienced lawyers as you are, to many classes of cases in which the right of injunction is constantly and necessarily used, cases growing out of differences between employer and employee that have nothing to do with labor disputes. For instance, I noted just yesterday the application for the issuance of an injunction in a case where an employer sought to restrain a former employee from betraying a trade secret which he had acquired during the course of his employment. It would obviously be a case within the meaning of that section. Nor need I attempt to enumerate the variety of cases that arise between employers and employees over the performance of contracts of various kinds and character.

Mr. WEBB. Would not the irreparable-damage provision cure that?

Mr. EMERY. I am assuming that there would be an irreparable damage, because in the case I allude to, in which the injunction is sought, of course the pleading is that irreparable damage would be done by the betrayal of the trade secret unless its disclosure is enjoined.

Mr. WEBB. Then this law would not prevent the injunctive relief.

Mr. EMERY. This bill would prevent injunctive relief by the second part of the first section, because it provides that no right resting upon the continuance of the relation of employer and employee can be protected by an injunction; the limitation likewise applies to the buying or selling of commodities or the creation or continuance of the relation of employer and employee, as, for instance, in a numerous class of cases where a singer or other performer breaks a contract and undertakes to perform at another theater. At present while an injunction may not issue to compel the specific performance of the contract, it will issue in a proper case to prevent the person, in view of the contractual breach, from appearing under another manager. These are merely illustrations, Mr. Chairman, of the scope of this bill, relations which I believe are beyond the intention of its author, but necessarily affected by its terms.

Furthermore, one can not examine the first section without inquiring what is there in the nature of the employment relation or a trade dispute itself that would lay the foundation of a Federal jurisdiction. The measure does not refer to any dispute affecting interstate commerce or any other thing specifically confided to the protection of the Federal Government, but declares any "case" appearing in a Federal court between an employer and an employee shall, by the first section of this bill, be arbitrarily denied equitable remedies administered by the same court in every other case in which those relations described do not exist.

This measure further provides that no right to assume the relation of employer or employee or to continue it, no right to good will in business, no right to buy or sell commodities, or to engage in business of any particular kind or at any particular place, or at all, shall, in any dispute in which the employment relation exists, be subject to the equitable protection of a Federal court unless a property right or property is involved. The restraining power of a court of equity is therefore limited to a controversy in which property or a property right is involved. That is a novel proposition to a body of lawyers, for all the textbooks that have been written upon this subject and the uniform decisions of our Federal and State courts are to the effect that not only are property and property rights the legitimate subjects of equitable protection, but likewise civil rights, and even personal rights of many kinds, under many circumstances. I could multiply cases indefinitely to confirm that proposition if I thought it necessary; but I am sure it is unnecessary here.

But moreover, Mr. Chairman, the specified rights, which in the latter half of the first section of this bill are expressly excluded from the protection of a court of equity, are property rights of the most fundamental character. Rights which have been the frequent subject of adjudication, not only by all the courts of last resort in the various States of the Union, but of the Supreme Court of the United States itself. It has been uniformly held that the right to engage in any particular business at any particular place, the right to buy labor and to sell it, is a fundamental right of liberty and property possessed by each citizen. Indeed, the right of liberty and the right of property are frequently so inextricably interwoven as to be indistinguishable in their exercise. It has been noted a curious thing that the Declaration of Independence nowhere mentions property rights; yet it has been said again and again by judges that undoubtedly the right of property is itself included in the right to pursue happiness. Mr. Justice Brewer, in a celebrated address at Yale University in 1891, which appears in the June number of the Yale Review of that year, argued that in the Declaration of Independence the right to acquire, possess, enjoy, and dispose of property was included in the right to pursue happiness. So it has been held again and again in various legal controversies that the constitutional guaranty that no person shall be deprived of property without "due process of law" embraces the very rights which by this bill are withdrawn from equitable protection. I shall not take up the time of this committee by citing many decisions of this character, which could be multiplied indefinitely. I will merely offer one or two for purposes of illustration, and ask the permission of the committee to include in my remarks the other citations which I do not present to the committee now, that I may save its time and mine.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be granted to you, Mr. Emery.

Mr. THOMAS. What is your definition of a property right?

Mr. EMERY. I think a property right can broadly be said to be any right embracing the acquisition, use, or disposition of property in any form. Of course, there are forms of property created by statute, and there are other forms of property which antedate our organic law, and are not created, but are merely recognized by it. It is to that especial class of rights I now call your attention. Thus, in the standard case of Algeyer v. Louisiana (165 U. S., 589), you will find the court says the constitutional guaranty embraces—

"the right of the citizen to be free in the enjoyment of all his faculties, to be free to use them in all lawful ways, to live and work where he will, and earn his livelihood by any lawful manner, to pursue any livelihood or avocation, and for that purpose to enter into all contracts that may be proper, necessary, and essential in his carrying out the purposes above mentioned."

Mr. THOMAS. Do you think that one man can have a property right in the labor of another?

Mr. EMERY. He can, by voluntary contract. I do not think there is any doubt of that; is there, Mr. Thomas?

Mr. THOMAS. I am not sure of that; I wanted your idea about it.

Mr. EMERY. If I enter into a contract with you to perform services for you, you surely have a property right in my service to the extent that I have agreed to deliver it to you for compensation.

Mr. THOMAS. If I were to break the contract, of course you would have an action at law against me.

Mr. EMERY. I presume so; but what would it be based upon? It would be based upon the loss you had suffered through my failure to perform that contract, and the court would be protecting your property right.

Mr. THOMAS. Would the court then issue an injunction to make me perform that contract?

Mr. EMERY. You mean if the specific performance of the contract involved human service?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. EMERY. Ordinarily not. There are exceptional cases in which courts have issued injunctions for the specific performance of a contract of a special character.

Mr. THOMAS. According to that, a man can contract himself into being a slave.

Mr. EMERY. No; that is not the intention at all. But those cases are specific, and involve a very abstruse branch of equity jurisprudence very rarely enforced. For all practical purposes no contract for the performance of labor can be enforced by injunction.

Mr. MOON. The court never enforced a contract specifically in the case of a singer; they simply prohibited her engaging anywhere else.

Mr. EMERY. There is a case in New York——

Mr. MOON. Not compelling her to sing. It prohibited her from singing anywhere else.

Mr. EMERY. Of course, I say it is a marked exception to the ordinary rule.

Mr. NYE. Even if they did that it would be a mandamus and not an injunction.

Mr. EMERY. That is a form of injunction.

The CHAIRMAN. In the case of the singer in New York to which you refer the court did seek to compel the singer to perform the contract and sing for the particular other party to the contract.

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOON. That has all been done away with now.

Mr. EMERY. Yes. I allude to that only as an exceptional case. The uniform doctrine of the American courts is expressed in the opinion in Arthur v. Oakes, written by Mr. Justice Harlan. This was an appeal from the decision in Farmers Loan & Trust Co. v. The Northern Pacific R. R. Co. (60 Fed., 803). In that case Mr. Justice Harlan held that no injunction would lie to compel men to remain at work, no matter if the anticipated quitting would result in loss of life or peril to property. This decision establishes a condition fundamentally different from that existing under the English law, for until the year 1875 it was possible, under Lord Elcho's act, passed in 1867, and under preceding legislation, to specifically enforce a contract for labor; and justices of the peace throughout England specifically enforced contracts for labor, and were empowered to punish the breach of a contract by a laborer as a crime. I shall later desire to call the attention of the committee to the statutes and the English practice on that subject, in order to show the committee that English legislation, which is offered here as a precedent, has no authority in law or fact.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask you about that decision of Mr. Justice Harlan you have cited in your brief.

Mr. EMERY. I have no brief here; but I shall cite the decisions—Arthur v. Oakes, 63 Fed., 319.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to read it myself, and I would like to have the reference made.

Mr. EMERY. That decision by Mr. Justice Harlan is the standard case on that subject. It was rendered by him when sitting in circuit.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that; but I wanted to read it again. I would like to have the reference in your remarks so that I can find it.

Mr. EMERY. I shall be glad to furnish it.

Mr. THOMAS. Do you think a thing is right just because a judicial tribunal or a number of judicial tribunals have declared that thing to be right?

Mr. EMERY. Declared what to be right, Mr. Thomas?

Mr. THOMAS. Any given thing, simply because a judicial tribunal declares a thing to be right.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand, Mr. Emery is not contending that that is right, but that it was the former practice in England.

Mr. THOMAS. Because a court has decided a matter to be right, does it necessarily follow that that thing is right?

Mr. EMERY. I do not know whether Mr. Thomas is referring to a specific case now.

Mr. THOMAS. No; just a general question.

Mr. MOON. That is what Mr. Gompers is trying to find out.

Mr. THOMAS. My question is this: Because a court decides a certain thing to be right, or a number of courts decide a certain thing to be a principle of law, do you think necessarily it is right and correct?

Mr. EMERY. I must confess, Mr. Thomas, that under orderly government, under constitutional government, I can do but one thing, either bow to the decision of the court when I have exhausted all ordinary forms of appeal, or else turn to the legislature for relief; and in the meantime I must obey the law, or law ceases and anarchy begins.

Mr. THOMAS. That is what they are doing in this act, turning to the legislature for relief.

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; but I am at this time undertaking to call to the attention of the committee that there are certain rights which are beyond the reach of the legislature.

Mr. WEBB. That is, the declaration of what is property and what is not property.

Mr. EMERY. I say, there are fundamental rights of property—the property, for instance, which a man has in his own labor—beyond legislative invasion. The right of property carries with it the right to have that property protected, and to deprive a person either of the property itself or of the means of protecting it and to leave him with no remedy is to deprive him of a constitutional guaranty.

Mr. WEBB. Do you think we can declare that good will is not property?

Mr. EMERY. I do not.

Mr. WEBB. That is what I was getting your idea on; I wanted to hear you on that.

Mr. EMERY. But my contention, so far as this first section is concerned, would not rest on that. I contend you can not say that a man's own labor is not property or that a man's right to conduct a lawful business is not a property right.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, the first section is open to still further objection, on the ground that it undertakes to establish rights in accordance with the class of controversy involved and under the same circumstances to give a different set of rights to every citizen. Thus, if this first section were to be construed in accordance with the declaration of Mr. Wilson, persons engaged in labor controversies would not possess certain rights of property entitled to the protection of a Federal court, although the same rights would be entitled to equitable protection when assailed by persons not engaged in a labor dispute. The rights of each person would thus depend, not upon their nature, but upon the character of the controversy in which they were involved. A right of property guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States would be entitled to all of the protection courts could give it under every circumstance, except when it was assailed in the course of a labor dispute. But in that case the right of property would be lost at the surface of the labor dispute and possess no protection until it emerged, if it survived, in which event, by the magic of this bill, it would regain its submerged rights.

I therefore insist that the first section of the bill—apart from its ambiguities and from the endeavor to lay a foundation for a Federal jurisdiction upon a relationship unconnected with any subject matter of Federal control—is objectionable on two grounds: First, it undertakes to deprive persons in controversies of the character enumerated of all equitable protection for civil rights, and, secondly, it undertakes to make one set of rights and remedies with respect to those engaged in labor controversies and another for those not so engaged. And, finally, that it undertakes to absolutely destroy fundamental property rights which have been repeatedly held by the courts of the United States to be beyond the reach of congressional invasion.

Mr. MOON. The Supreme Court has already decided that that classification is unconstitutional so far as State legislation is concerned, under the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. EMERY. Absolutely. The position of the courts with respect to these rights is not new. It is as old as the existence of courts in England or the United States. Lord Bramwell, in the case of Regina v. Druitt (10 Cox C. C., 592), calls attention to this when he says:

"No right of property or capital was so sacred or carefully guarded by the law of the land as that of personal liberty. That liberty was not liberty of the body only—it was also a liberty of the mind and will; and the liberty of a man's mind and will—to say how he should bestow himself, his means, his talent, and his industry—was as much a subject of the law's protection as was that of his body."

In the Slaughterhouse cases (83 U. S., 36) our own court said, again, through Mr. Justice Bradley:

"For the preservation, exercise, and enjoyment of these rights the individual citizen as a necessity must be left free to adopt such calling, profession, or trade as may seem to him most conducive to that end. Without this right he can not be a free man. The right to choose one's calling is an essential part of that liberty which is the object of Government to protect; and a calling when chosen is a man's property and right. Liberty and property are not protected where these rights are arbitrarily assailed."

And in the great decision written by Mr. Justice Harlan, United States v. Adair (208 U. S.), he reiterated the doctrine, which has been enunciated in the Federal courts time out of mind, and in all the courts of the United States which have had occasion to pass upon the issue involved, that the right of a man to enter into a contract for the sale of his labor and the right of another to enter into a contract for purchase of labor were at once rights of liberty and property; and Congress could not invade such rights without a violation of the fifth amendment. In that case, you will remember, the Government undertook to indict and punish one Adair, an agent of the Louisville & Nashville road, because he had discharged a man, or threatened to discharge him, on account of his membership in a union, in violation of a certain provision of the Erdmann Act. The court pointed out that the right to quit and the right to discharge were correlative rights, and you could not take away from the citizen the right to discharge without asserting the right to take away from him the right to quit. You could not curtail one end of the contractual power without curtailing the other end, so that every invasion of the right of the employers to discharge would be an invasion of the right of the employee to quit.

Mr. WEBB. Do they not say you could not do that as an incident to the interstate-commerce power in the Constitution?

Mr. EMERY. The issue raised by Mr. Justice Harlan was whether or not the provision was repugnant to the fifth amendment to the Constitution, and not the interstate-commerce clause. The question was not whether Congress could so act under the interstate-commerce clause, but whether or not, possessing the power to regulate commerce, they could, with the prohibition of the fifth amendment staring them in the face, take away from a citizen the right to exercise that right of liberty and property.

Mr. WEBB. But Congress based its power to pass such a law on the commerce clause of the Constitution, I believe.

Mr. EMERY. They based their right, yes. But the court said they could not exercise it because, under the system of checks and balances, of course, one provision of the Constitution set off against another.

Mr. NYE. This bill would run against an employee who sought to enjoin his employer from discharging him?

Mr. EMERY. Of course; or from blacklisting him, for that matter. It would favor a combination of employers who agreed among themselves that they would not employ a particular man themselves and would undertake to prevent his employment by others; that is, if the agreement arose out of a labor dispute.

Mr. NORRIS. The writ could not issue in that case.

Mr. EMERY. It could not lie for the other reason—that the man would not have any property right at stake. Under this bill his right to be employed would cease to be a right. He would have no right to enter into a contract with an employer; that could be protected from the interference of third parties by a court of equity.

But, Mr. Chairman, the second section of the bill is still more astounding in its proposals. It provides that in cases arising in the courts of the United States, or coming before said courts—and I should say here, Mr. Chairman, that as the word "cases" is not qualified we must look to the subject matter to ascertain whether it applies to civil or to criminal cases or to both, and from the subject matter included it obviously applies to both civil and criminal cases and to all courts of the United States. It would be a limitation not only upon the controversies of individuals but likewise upon those of the Government of the United States itself and upon States appearing in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Emery, do you contend that the legislature or Congress has not the right to limit a property right, define it, and say what it shall be?

Mr. EMERY. I do not question the right of Congress to limit some property rights, but there are others which are beyond the control of Congress. Of course, in the exercise of a property right, as distinguished from its ownership or possession, Congress can limit, as every legislature necessarily must, the uses of property, to secure the equal right of every citizen to the use and enjoyment of his property.

Mr. THOMAS. Can not State legislatures, for instance, absolutely say who shall and who shall not own property, certain kinds of property of their own; how they shall inherit, and so on?

Mr. EMERY. Our courts have been pretty busy, Mr. Thomas, for years, invalidating legislation which attempted to confiscate certain people's property or permitting a reasonable return on it. I am sure the gentleman does not contend for a minute that the Congress of the United States can say the property which A has should now belong to B. That is precisely what is done here.

Mr. THOMAS. I beg to differ with you about that. Can not Congress define and limit property rights?

Mr. EMERY. It can define and limit some property rights, but there are some that it can not. It depends on whether your definition is to be regulative or prohibitive.

Mr. MOON. It can also create some rights.

Mr. EMERY. It can, of course, create many. It creates many valuable property rights. Every time it grants a pension it creates a property right. Every time it permits an incorporation in the District of Columbia it creates property rights. For many property uses of which we speak, quite apart from their tangible objects, have been held to be and are property. Thus we tax as property a corporate franchise, or a license, or a right to use a highway or a street.

The second section provides that in any case, whether civil or criminal, arising in the courts of the United States, or coming before said courts, no agreement between two persons either concerning the labor relation or concerning any act or thing to be done or not to be done, either in reference to or growing out of a labor dispute, shall neither constitute a conspiracy or be punished or prosecuted or become basis of an action for damages, unless the thing agreed to be done or omitted would be unlawful if done by one person. Needless to say, Mr. Chairman, no lawyer can hear that proposition without realizing that it is a subversion of the whole law of conspiracy, based as it is upon the belief that there are many things not unlawful for one person which become unlawful when numbers agree to do them. Thus, while any man may refuse to sell his product to another, it is quite a different thing if two or more persons agree not to sell to another. It is one thing for a man to refuse to deal with another; it becomes quite a different proposition when many agree not to deal with him until he does something they require him to do, or until he does something to another person which they demand him to do. That doctrine has been recognized since the foundation of English law, from the first statute on conspiracy, in the reign of Edward the First, to the last modification of it by the English Parliament in 1906.

Mr. MOON. It absolutely abolishes the distinction between conspiracy and the overt act, does it not?

Mr. EMERY. Absolutely; because, of course, it can neither be unlawful nor criminal for two persons to have a common intention to do the same thing until that intention is reduced to an agreement. When they agree to do an unlawful thing, the agreement itself, irrespective of any overt act, is either a crime or civilly unlawful, in accordance with the nature of the thing agreed to be done; and no other element enters until we consider the legality or criminality of particular means.

Mr. HOWLAND. In that connection, Mr. Wilson called our attention, arguing this same proposition, to these voluntary organizations, one of which I have in mind, for instance, where they refused to purchase eggs because they were so high priced, a voluntary organization. Another one was formed a year ago, which people very generally joined, refusing to purchase meat because of the high prices that the retailers were charging the public. Does that come under the head of conspiracy or boycott, or how do you differentiate those?

Mr. EMERY. In the first place, it is not an agreement directed against any person; it is an agreement like a pledge among a large number of people not to take a drink. It is not directed against any individual, and does not affect any individual particularly. It passes out of the realm of the abstract, as it were, and enters into the realm of the concrete when made with reference to a particular individual.

Mr. HOWLAND. It applies to the corner butcher in a particular neighborhood.

Mr. EMERY. It applies to all butchers, like the resolution of a vegetarian society, that agrees not to eat meat.

Mr. MOON. A conspiracy is defined as an agreement to do an unlawful thing——

Mr. EMERY. Exactly.

Mr. MOON. Or an agreement to do a lawful thing in an unlawful manner. But an agreement not to eat meat is not an agreement to do an unlawful thing.

Mr. HOWLAND. That is another way of stating the proposition. The agreement is not to buy any meat.

Mr. MOON. That is not an unlawful thing.

Mr. EMERY. The agreement not to eat it would necessarily include an agreement not to buy it.

Mr. NORRIS. Would not the intention had by the parties govern?

Mr. EMERY. Of course.

Mr. NORRIS. If they should make an agreement not to buy meat of you, if you were a butcher, for the purpose of running you out of business——

Mr. EMERY. Exactly.

Mr. NORRIS. That would be a vastly different proposition.

Mr. EMERY. It is the only department of the law where the court enters into the conscience of the actor.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. EMERY. Intention is the dominant standard by which to judge the act of a combination, as has been said again and again by many courts.

Let me call the attention of the committee to the effect of section 2 of this bill upon existing legislation before presenting any legal objection to it. If this measure were the law, any agreement between two or more persons relating to the employment contract or with reference to any act or omission involving, growing out of, or in furtherance of a trade dispute would not be unlawful or criminal or render the parties liable in damages unless the thing agreed to be done or not to be done would be unlawful if done by one person. This privilege is not confined to the parties engaged in the trade dispute. It covers any agreement made by persons with reference to such dispute, whether they be engaged in it or not.

Now, Mr. Chairman, observe the legal effect of this provision upon the operation of the Sherman Act as it is now interpreted. At present I think it will be conceded that any one of the great meat packers may lawfully fix the price at which he will sell his own commodity, but if two or more packers make an agreement to fix the price of meat, we have a contract in restraint of trade—a Beef Trust—that may be prosecuted, fined, or dissolved. But if the packers of the United States or any number of the great firms engaged in that business—the Armours, the Swifts, or others equally well known—in furtherance of a strike or because of it entered into an agreement to raise the price of their product, either to meet the expense of the struggle or to make the consumer realize the cost of the strike to him and excite his sympathy for their interest, the agreement, this bill being the law, would be lawful, for, having grown out of a trade dispute, its legality would be no longer tested by the Sherman Act but by the standard of this bill, and the act of the combination raising the price of meat would not be unlawful if done by one person.

Suppose two or more of the railroads of the United States were again faced with the conditions created by the great Debs strike of 1894, many arteries of commerce hopelessly obstructed, cars idle on many tracks, property in the hands of the mob, the carriers unable to fulfill their contracts with passengers or shippers or perform the duties laid upon them by law. Let us assume the strike was precipitated by a demand for increased pay which the carriers believed their existing revenues would not permit them to grant, and in order to meet these demands they agreed to raise their rates, or suppose that they engaged new men to take the places of the old employees and found themselves heavily burdened with the costs of the strike, and for that reason they agreed to raise their rates. Now, I submit that it is not unlawful for one carrier to raise its rates, subject to whatever action the Interstate Commerce Commission may take, but it is unlawful for two carriers to agree to fix a rate. In this instance under either condition suggested the agreement would be born of a trade dispute. It would be in furtherance of it or had grown out of it, and under the standard established by this bill it could not be unlawful under the interstate-commerce act or the act of 1890, for the third section of this measure would have repealed every act or part of an act in conflict with its own terms and standards. Let me add another illustration by calling to your minds the state of facts presented in the Toledo & Ann Arbor Railroad v. The Pennsylvania Co. (54 Fed. Rep., 730).

The plaintiff in that case was engaged in a trade dispute with its trainmen. It was the only carrier involved in that dispute, but under rule 12 of the Brotherhood, then in operation, the trainmen of all the other roads refused to handle the cars of the Toledo & Ann Arbor. The Pennsylvania road was required by law to afford equal facilities to the cars of all other carriers over its tracks. The employees of that road by refusing to handle the cars of the Toledo & Ann Arbor under threat of strike were conspiring to compel the Pennsylvania road to violate the law. The Pennsylvania road was thereupon enjoined from refusing to handle the cars of the Toledo & Ann Arbor, and the officers of the Railway Brotherhood were restrained from issuing or continuing in force any order or rule which required the employees in the service of the Pennsylvania road to refuse to handle the cars of the plaintiff. Under the second section of this bill, no such injunction could issue, because it would be perfectly lawful for any individual trainman to threaten to quit, or to actually do so, if the Pennsylvania road handled any cars which for any reason, good, bad, or indifferent, was objectionable to him.

It must therefore be evident that the Sherman Act, the interstate-commerce act, and every section of the Federal criminal code relating to conspiracy, agreements, or combinations would be modified or repealed by this bill to the extent that every combined action forbidden by them would be measured when done in connection or because of a trade dispute by the standard established in this bill.

It is an elementary principle of construction that a sovereign legislates with respect to its own jurisdiction. When the Congress legislates, it does so within the sphere of Federal authority. There are many acts of a criminal and unlawful nature which Congress has not made it an offense for an individual to do which is covered by statutes respecting conspiracy. There is no Federal statute making it a crime for an individual to destroy railroad signals, derail trains, or obstruct the movement of commerce, saving only the mails; yet conspiracies to this end undertaken in the course of a labor dispute can now be restrained or prosecuted. Under the provisions of this bill, and under the standard established by it, such acts would no longer be reachable within the Federal jurisdiction by the remedies now known to the law.

Mr. Chairman, the conditions to which I refer are not imaginary, but very real. They have been the incidents of great labor disturbances of the past and may belong to those of the future. Complaint has been recently made of labor conditions in the steel industry. Suppose a great struggle broke out there between employers and employees, and the manufacturers of steel entered into an agreement because of various circumstances connected with the struggle to raise the price of steel. Each manufacturer may now fix the price of his own commodity. Under this bill, if many or all agreed to do it in furtherance or because of a trade dispute in which they had been involved, the contract would be legal where it is now unlawful.

To turn again to the experiences of the past, you will remember that in 1894, during the Debs strike, the attention of Judge Grosscup, then sitting in the Circuit Court of the United States at Chicago, was called to a newspaper statement to the effect that certain railway managers were undertaking to employ men in the place of the strikers, but had agreed among themselves that they would not employ or undertake to employ men to operate the trains, in order that they might excite public sympathy in their behalf and cause the public to realize the distress of the labor disturbance more keenly than they did. Judge Grosscup called together the Federal grand jury in Chicago, directed their attention to this statement, and caused them to make an investigation of its truth, advising the grand jury that if any or all of the railroad managers had entered into an agreement of that character, it amounted to a conspiracy to prevent the operation of the railroads and the parties to the agreement were liable to indictment. But, Mr. Chairman, had this bill then been the law and had the condition described been a fact, the agreement would not have made any party to it liable for indictment, because it would have been and is perfectly lawful for the manager of any one road to discharge or refuse to employ any individual, and had the agreement alleged grown out of the labor dispute in the manner described it would have been perfectly lawful under the terms of the Wilson bill. So this measure would validate an agreement among railroads to prevent the performance of their own functions as common carriers, provided it was made to further their interest as parties to a trade dispute.

One might multiply the illustrations indefinitely, for the principle applies to every department of combined action, and you will observe that every agreement of the kind described in this bill is not only made proof against civil or criminal liability, but its exclusion is made secure against interference by the terms of the latter part of the second section, which provides that no such agreement shall be enjoined by any Federal court.

Mr. NYE. Is not the essence of a conspiracy an agreement, anyway?

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

Mr. NYE. And one man can not make an agreement with himself, can he?

Mr. EMERY. Evidently not, although I suppose some men do make agreements with their conscience and violate the contract.

Mr. WEBB. One gentleman the other day illustrated his objection to this legislation by saying that in case a big strike should occur and strike breakers were induced to go in and take the places of the strikers, and a strike breaker passing along the street should be accosted—or, not accosted, but if one of the strikers should point his finger at him and follow him down the street—that would probably not be a violation of the law; but if every one of the strikers should line themselves up along the street and point their fingers at him that would be a violation of the law, and ought to be a violation of the law, but would not be if this law was passed. What is your opinion about that?

Mr. EMERY. Certainly, Mr. Chairman, it validates any act resting upon the intimidation of numbers which one person might lawfully do. It is well known that the mere presence of numbers of men assuming a threatening attitude, but uttering no word of speech, is a most powerful coercive influence. Mr. Justice Brewer said in his remarkable address before the American Bar Association on the "Movement of coercion":

"When a thousand laborers gather around a railroad track and say to those who seek employment that they had better not, and when that advice is supplemented every little while by a terrible assault on one who disregards it, everyone knows that something more than advice is intended. It is coercion, force; it is the effort of the many, by the mere weight of numbers, to compel the one to do their bidding."

The English reports likewise present many cases of criminal prosecution for intimidation by mere numbers, although the trade-disputes act of 1906 amended the conspiracy and protection of property act of 1875 so as to provide that it should not be unlawful merely to attend at or near a house or place where a person resides or works merely to obtain or communicate information. Thus a typical case, to pursue the illustration suggested by Mr. Webb, is that of Wilson v. Renton (1910 S. C. (J.) 32 Ct. of Just.).

This was a criminal proceeding under section 7 of the conspiracy and protection of property act of 1875, to which the amendment of the trade-disputes act of 1906, to which I have referred, was offered as a defense. It appeared that during a coopers' strike two strikers remained near the homes of two workmen who had not joined the strike, and when these two left their houses the pickets signaled to a crowd which had gathered and followed the men back to work. It was held that there was no evidence of effort to obtain or communicate information, as permitted under subsection 1 of section 2 of the trade-disputes act of 1906. The defendants were convicted. These are common forms of intimidation peculiar to labor disputes which this bill would legalize within the Federal jurisdiction. Thus, too, a body of men might gather before a boycotted store, and there are many people who would not enter it under such circumstances because they feared annoyance or trouble. Indeed, Justice Brewer touched the very essence of intimidation in his description.

So I submit that it must be evident that section 2 of this bill would not only work a revolution in the law of conspiracy, but would seriously impair private and public rights by the modification its terms necessarily work on every legislative act in the Federal statute book predicated upon the existing theory of the acts of combinations and conspiracies, for you must observe that section 3 of this bill reads: "That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed." So that every measure of law now in existence in contradiction to the theory of this bill would be superseded by it.

Mr. MOON. What do you think of the constitutionality of this provision in operation?

Mr. EMERY. It must be obvious, Mr. Chairman, that it is open to the same constitutional objection as the first section. It undertakes to provide one standard of law for all agreements as to acts or omissions in reference to labor disputes, and another standard of law for the same acts when not done in reference to labor disputes. The same agreement made by the same individuals would be legal or illegal, criminal or innocent, according as it grows out of a labor dispute or does not. It has been repeatedly said that the equal protection of the law assures the protection of equal laws. This is precisely the type of invidious discriminating legislation condemned by Mr. Justice Harlan in the case of Connolly v. The Union Sewer Pipe Co. (184 U. S., 540), Ex Parte Drayton (153 Fed., 986), and in many familiar decisions of a similar nature.

Mr. WEBB. It is 5 minutes of 12 o'clock. Mr. Emery, how long will you want to conclude your remarks?

Mr. EMERY. Mr. Chairman, I have had many interruptions, and while I am very glad to answer questions, you can perceive that it deprives me of much time that I need.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; we all see that. We are very much interested in your argument, and we would be glad, if you think it will do just as well, to have you file a brief, and we will all be pleased to read it; or we might be able to give you a little more time now.

Mr. EMERY. Will you give me 15 minutes more and let me conclude with a brief?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, there is no disposition on the part of any member of the committee not to hear Mr. Emery as long as possible, but in the very nature of things, we have had so many hearings and we have so many things to do that we can not, of course, give any gentleman as much time as he would like to have. The agreement was that you were to have one hour, and it was stated to you at that time what the circumstances were under which this committee was laboring. We have consumed perhaps more time than any other committee, at this session of Congress, with hearings, and our time is so constantly drawn upon that we have hardly had time to go into executive session to consider matters that ought to have been considered there. However, without objection, Mr. Emery will proceed for 15 minutes, subject to the understanding that if there is a call of the House the committee will go.

Mr. EMERY. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I believe that interrogatories during the course of a discussion of this character greatly contribute to the illumination of the discussion. Nevertheless, they frequently divert it and prevent an orderly presentation of argument. For that reason I shall ask the chairman to permit me, if I do not conclude within 15 minutes, to include other matter which I desire to lay before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. You shall have that privilege. Of course, the committee assumes that you will not abuse the privilege, and that your extension will be reasonable.

Mr. EMERY. I have undertaken to analyze the terms and describe the effect of this measure and to indicate what seemed to me the insuperable constitutional objections to the proposals of this bill, but I have only suggested the serious consequences that would follow to the private citizen and to the public interest if Congress undertook to give what is here asked.

Let me now revert to a topic which, but for the extraordinary nature of this proposal, I should have presented first:

A revolutionary request of this character can be predicated on but one of two things: Either the law as it now is is oppressive in its nature or it is oppressively administered.

As a preliminary, Mr. Chairman, let me correct the exaggerated notion which prevails as to the frequency with which the Federal courts issue the writ of injunction in labor disputes. To hear the clamor against "government by injunction" one might imagine that one of the leading if not the chief occupation of a Federal court was the issuance of injunctions in labor disputes. There is a sort of delusion that the courts of the United States are constantly crowded by employers seeking writs of prohibition against labor unions, and that there is a sort of competition between them and the State courts to see who shall issue such orders most frequently.

Therefore, before I ask you to consider the nature of the circumstances under which the writ has been and is issued in labor disputes, let us pause and inquire how often applications for its use are made. I have during the last few years carefully watched the records of the Federal courts and have recently compiled some figures in respect to this matter. The Federal Reporter discloses that from January 1, 1903, to January 1, 1912, a period of nine years, 473 injunctions were issued by district and circuit courts of the United States, and of this number but 25 related to labor disputes, leaving 447 covering every other form of litigation. (For list of such cases see Mr. Emery's argument before Committee on the Judiciary, Feb. 14, 1912.)

But it may be said there are other reasons why the Federal Government should set an example in the matter, because the State courts issue injunctive writs in labor disputes in larger numbers than are justified, and restraining legislation in a Federal jurisdiction would offer a deserved example to the courts of the States.

Of course, such observations as I am now making leave out of consideration the justification or lack of justification for the issuance of such writs. But to show further the continuous exaggeration indulged respecting the frequency with which labor injunctions are being issued, in alleged proof of the ease with which they may be obtained, I call your attention to reliable statistics from one of the great industrial States—Massachusetts. The data are supplied by the Massachusetts department of labor, in Labor Bulletin No. 70, for December, 1909, and is compiled by the Bureau of Statistics. It discloses that during 11 years covered by the investigation, from 1898 to 1908, there were reported 2,002 strikes. In 66 of these, or 3.29 per cent, the employers concerned sought injunctions restraining the strikers from doing certain acts complained of. In 46 strikes, or 2.24 per cent of the total number, injunctions were issued. In 9, or 0.44 per cent, there were proceedings for contempt of court. In 2 strikes of the 2,002 reported, there were convictions for contempt following the disobedience of a writ.

The CHAIRMAN. Were the injunctions in those cases issued by the Federal courts?

Mr. EMERY. No, sir; they were issued by the State courts of Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. Were any issued by the Federal courts?

Mr. EMERY. In Massachusetts?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; during that period you speak of.

Mr. EMERY. I do not remember a single one issued in that judicial district.

Mr. WEBB. What period of time does the data cover?

Mr. EMERY. With respect to Massachusetts, it includes 11 years, from 1898 to 1908, inclusive. That which I offered you respecting the Federal courts included the period from January 1, 1903, to January 1, 1912—nine years. In relation to this subject, let me in passing call your attention to a comment made not long since by the Supreme Court of the United States.

In the case of Ex parte Young, an action in which the attorney general of the State of Minnesota was cited for contempt, it was argued by counsel that if the power of the Federal courts to interpose by injunction in proceedings of the kind at issue were sustained it would mean a flood of injunctions, and the inferior Federal courts might fall under the temptation to misuse their power. To this the Supreme Court replied on March 23, 1908 (207 U. S.):

"To this it may be answered in the first place that no injunction ought to be granted except in a case reasonably free from doubt. We think such rule is and will be followed by all the judges of the Federal courts."

From this comment it must be evident that the Supreme Court neither was in possession of information nor has as yet been impressed in the course of its experience with instances in which Federal judges were abusing their power to issue injunctions in labor or other cases.

During the course of many discussions had before this committee concerning measures to regulate or limit the injunctive power of Federal courts we have again and again challenged those who charge those tribunals with abuses of power to produce their evidence before this committee.

In response to that challenge and to the reiterated request of members of the committee Mr. Gompers produced, three years ago, a body of manuscript which the committee caused to be printed under the title of "Injunction data filed by Samuel Gompers." Fully half the pamphlet is given over to matter having no relation to injunctions, including decisions referring to the eight-hour law, employers' liability, the maritime contract, the bakers' 10-hour case, and the Danbury hatters' decision, in which no injunction was involved, all of which decisions, while perhaps objectionable to Mr. Gompers, have, with reference to the issue before this committee, like the flowers that bloom in the spring, "nothing to do with the case." There were, however, some 18 injunctive orders covering the period between 1893 and 1907, but the orders were unaccompanied by any criticism, and no effort was made to specify any or all of the critic's objections.

I have examined all of these orders, making a brief analysis of each, and, with the permission of the committee, I shall file this statement with my remarks, including with it the list of Federal injunctions to which I have referred, issued during the period from January 1, 1903, to January 1, 1912. I have separated the orders issued in labor disputes during that period from all others, and arranged them so that the committee will perceive the comparison. You can thus observe at a glance the number and character of the Federal writs issued.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, you will have liberty to print what you wish.

Mr. EMERY. The statement is as follows:

ANALYSIS OF INJUNCTION DATA FILED BY SAMUEL GOMPERS WITH THE HOUSE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE, 1908.

[This data was unaccompanied by any comment or criticisms and comprehends 23 decisions, orders, and complaints relating to injunctions.]

In one instance the exhibit is merely a complaint in the case of the Grand Trunk R. R. Co. v. Gratiot Lodge et al. The case does not appear in the reports and upon the face of the complaint there is no evidence that even a restraining order was issued. In two other instances, Boyer v. The Western Union Telegraph Co. (124 Fed., 246) and Platt v. The Philadelphia & Reading R. R. (65 Fed., 660), decisions are presented in which petition for restraining orders were sought by certain labor organizations against employing corporations and denied. These obviously are not evidence of abuse of power by any judge in the issuance of injunctions. The right to discharge exercised in both cases is fully vindicated by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Adair v. U. S. (208 U. S.), while the alleged blacklist in the Boyer case consisted of the opinion of a record maintained by the company itself in which was entered the cause of discharge.

In two other cases, Bender v. The Typographical Union and the Buck's Stove & Range Co. v. The American Federation of Labor, the injunctions were issued by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. In the Bender case a preliminary injunction was denied and the application for a permanent injunction granted after a full hearing and argument. From the final decree the respondents entered an appeal, which they subsequently withdrew of their own volition, thus confessing the futility of their own contentions.

In the Buck's case the preliminary injunction was issued two months and a half after the service of the motion to show cause, and on the motion to make the injunction permanent the defendants did not contest the decree. Exercising, however, a right of appeal, they found through it an appropriate remedy by use of which they secured a slight modification of the permanent injunction. Their chief contention appears to have been that a court of equity infringed upon the right of free speech and the press whenever it undertook to enjoin the publication of matter intended to further the prosecution of a boycott.

In support of this contention, Gompers, Mitchell, and Morrison, in a proceeding for contempt which reached the Supreme Court of the United States, pleaded that the injunction was void because it had in the manner described infringed upon the freedom of speech and the press. This contention was met, set aside, and the injunction fully sustained in that respect by the Supreme Court. (Gompers v. Buck's Stove & Range Co., 219 U. S., 340.)

The remaining injunctive data consist of 18 orders issued by Federal courts between December, 1893, and November, 1907. They are here considered seriatim:

Farmers Loan & Trust Co. v. Northern Pacific Railroad.

(60 Fed., 803.)

It appears that the receivers of the Northern Pacific Railroad filed a petition seeking permission to put certain wage scales in effect January 1, 1894, and asking that certain defendants, members of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, be enjoined against interfering with the operation of the road by combining and conspiring to quit its service for that purpose. An order in accordance with prayer of the complainant was issued December 19, and a motion to modify the same by P. M. Arthur, grand chief of the Railway Brotherhood, was heard February 15, 1894. On that date the order was modified by striking out the words "and from further recommending, approving, or advising others to quit the service of the receivers of the Northern Pacific Railroad on January 1, 1894, or at any other time." Further modification was refused.

Appeal was taken from this refusal, and in Arthur v. Oaks (63 Fed. Rep., 319) Mr. Justice Harlan, sitting in circuit, further modified the order appealed from. It was contended on this appeal that the court had exceeded its power by enjoining the employees of the receivers "from combining and conspiring to quit, with or without notice, the service of said receivers, with the object and intent of crippling the property in their custody or embarrassing the operation of said railroad, and from so quitting the service of said receivers, with or without notice, as to cripple the property or prevent or hinder the operation of said railroad."

Mr. Justice Harlan held that the clause embodied two distinct propositions, one relating to combinations and conspiracies to quit the service of the receivers with the object or intent to cripple the property or embarrass the operation of the road in their charge; the other having no reference to combinations and conspiracies to quit or to the object and intent of so quitting, but applying to employees "so quitting" as to cripple the property or prevent or hinder the operation of the road. The appellate court sustained the order with respect to the first proposition and eliminated from it the latter phrase "and from so quitting the service of said receivers, with or without notice, as to cripple the property or prevent or hinder the operation of said railroad."

It is apparent from the elaborate decision of Judge Jenkins that he was facing with great embarrassment and for the first time the difficult problem of deciding how far a court might go in protecting property of a quasi public nature for the operation of which the court was responsible. The error made by the court resulted very evidently from a sincere effort to perform its duty and was fully corrected by the court of appeals, nor has any similar error been made in the issuance of the writ of injunctions since. The case is not an evidence of abuse of discretion, but a mistake corrected on appeal. A remedy was in the hands of the defendant and secured by its use a decision which strikingly vindicated the rights of the employees.

Ames v. The Union Pacific (Jan. 27, 1894).

In this case an injunction was issued on petition of the receivers of the Union Pacific Railroad in practically the language sustained by Mr. Justice Harlan in Arthur v. Oaks. Twelve days after this order was issued in Ames v. Union Pacific (60 Fed., 674), the court refused to approve a reduction of wages by the receiver or a change in the rules affecting working conditions until the employees had been notified of the proposed change and were given a proper opportunity to point out to the court any inequality or injustice threatened by such change.

Under these circumstances the order can not be legally or practically objectionable. It deserves, on the other hand, the approval of workingmen themselves for the evidence it supplies of considerate regard for the rights of the employees of the road.

Western Coal Mining Co. v. Puckett.

(Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Arkansas.)

The exhibit is a naked restraining order unaccompanied by the complaint or any other document throwing light on the action, nor does the case appear in any report. It is therefore uncertain, assuming the order to have been issued, that any objection was made by defendants at the time of its issuance or that any subsequent effort was made to dissolve or modify it. Upon its face, the order suggests an exceedingly serious situation, inasmuch as it enjoins the display of firearms and the marching of armed men over roads adjacent to the complainant's mines for the purpose of intimidating the complainant's employees. In view of the conditions which surround the exhibit, no criticism is sustained or sustainable.

Reinecke Coal Mining Co. v. Wood.

(Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Kentucky, 112 Fed., 497.)

In this case a restraining order was issued November 13, 1901, and promptly heard on November 25, motion for a preliminary injunction being granted after argument and hearing. The opinion discloses a remarkable condition. It appears that certain coal miners of Indiana and Illinois, members of the United Mine Workers, complained that certain miners belonging to their organization in Kentucky were not receiving the wage schedule fixed at Indianapolis, the Illinois and Indiana miners fearing they could not maintain their own schedule unless that of the Kentucky miners was increased. Agents of the union were therefore dispatched into Kentucky to bring about an increase in the pay of union miners there. As a result of this effort, operators—notably of Central City, Ky.—agreed to the schedule demanded provided it was adopted in a majority of the mines in another district, that in Hopkins County, where it appears nonunion men were chiefly employed.

From the evidence before the court it formed the opinion that the relations between the employers and employees in these nonunion mines were mutually satisfactory, and that for the most part the employees did not wish to join the union.

Under these circumstances it appears that the defendants and others invaded the Hopkins district, armed and in great numbers, establishing camps in the vicinity of the nonunion mines, which camps were maintained for many months, the roads and various approaches to the mines were picketed and patrolled for the purpose of intimidating nonunion miners and coercing them to join the union, and thus bring about a strike unless the union scale was adopted. The evidence disclosed that nonunion men were continually threatened and assaulted and the adoption of defensive measures caused instant collisions and disorder.

The court finds that the conditions sought to be brought about were "undesired and vigorously repelled by the employers and a vast majority of the employees." The court is evidently so impressed with the conditions presented to it that it remarks: "If this court can not in a case like this protect the rights of a citizen when assailed, as those of the complainant have been in this instance, there is a decrepitude in judicial power which would be mortifying to every thoughtful man."

The circumstances of record do not, therefore, disclose either in the facts of the case or in the terms of the order itself a cause for criticism, but rather a proper and necessary exercise of the court's power.

Wabash Railroad Co. v. Hannahan.

(Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri, 121 Fed., 563.)

In this case a temporary restraining order was issued on a verified bill of complaint, and many affidavits alleging a combination and conspiracy by the Brotherhood of Firemen and Railway Trainmen to compel the exclusive recognition of their organization and the discharge by complainant of all nonmembers, this to be accomplished by the calling of a strike for that purpose, and it was further alleged and supported by affidavits that plaintiff's employees were entirely satisfied with their conditions of employment. Defendants filed an answer denying plaintiff's allegations, and especially that the employees were satisfied with working conditions, and declaring that defendants were engaged in good faith in bettering the condition of employees and that the strike they were parties to was sanctioned for the purpose of peacefully and lawfully accomplishing these things.

At the hearing the court vacated the restraining order, holding that the weight of evidence did not show an unlawful combination, but only a rightful purpose on the part of the Railway Brotherhood, acting through their representatives, to peacefully and lawfully quit the plaintiff's employ for the purpose of bettering their condition.

This case does not show the slightest abuse of discretion but, on the contrary, that the union involved was fully sustained in the lawful exercise of its rights and found in orderly procedure a complete vindication of its claims.

Mobile & Ohio R. R. v. E. E. Clark.

(Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Tennessee, May 11, 1903.)

The exhibit consists of a restraining order issued on the filing of a complaint May 11, 1903, and made returnable May 13, two days later. The case does not appear in the reports, and no record is offered to show what considerations led the court to issue the order in question, nor does it appear that it was contested or made the subject of any complaint at the time of its issuance. Under such circumstances, since the order is not objectionable on its face, it can not be perceived that there is just ground for criticism.

Newport Iron & Brass Foundry Co. v. Iron Molders' Union.

(Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio, Western Division, Sept. 22, 1904.)

The exhibit is an alleged copy of a final injunction evidently issued after argument and hearing. The case does not appear in the reports and as the defendants were evidently represented by counsel and were unable to sustain their contentions in court and made no effort at appeal, a ground for criticism is not apparent.

Kemmerer v. Haggerty (July 15, 1905).

(Circuit Court of the United States for West Virginia, 139 Fed., 693.)

This injunction was issued during the course of a strike of United Mine Workers against the Pennsylvania Consolidated Co., a West Virginia corporation, which was made a defendant, together with the mine workers involved, by certain nonresident stockholders. The corporation and the miners' organization were citizens of the same State, the corporation sought an injunction in the State courts against certain of the miners, alleging that they were interfering with the operation of the corporation's property by intimidating and coercing nonunion employees. At this point certain Pennsylvania stockholders of the corporation endeavored to obtain a Federal injunction for the same purpose, asserting to that end their diverse citizenship.

A temporary restraining order was issued on the filing of the stockholders' complaint, and immediately thereafter motion for a preliminary injunction was heard. The order was then vacated on the ground that the action of the nonresident stockholders was collusive and the court had no jurisdiction.

It is difficult to conjecture the character of the complaint against this action, for the court refused to do precisely what the employing stockholders desired it to do, and sharply rebuked and defeated their effort to establish a bogus jurisdiction for the purpose of obtaining a Federal injunction.

A. T. & S. F. R. R. v. Gee.

(139 Fed., 582, and 140 Fed., 153.)

The exhibit shows proceedings for contempt growing out of violations of an order issued in May, 1904. An examination of the record shows the order to have been issued during a strike of machinists against the Santa Fe road and shows that no effort was made by defendants to modify or vacate the order and that no objection was raised to it of any character by counsel or defendants. The opinion discloses picketing accompanied by intimidation and coercion and constant violence to persons and property. The court remarks:

"There would have been no occasion for its interference if there had been any honesty of purpose by the local authorities to maintain peace and order. Intimidation, threats, violence, and brutality were all winked at because of the belief on the part of certain police officers that they would be kindly remembered on future election days."

The contempt proceedings are remarkable for the leniency and consideration shown to the respondents. The defendants were cited in April, and after hearing the evidence in July the court took the matter under consideration, making an oral statement at the time, which, by direction, was sent to each defendant, the court stating therein that it was intended as a warning, and that in the pronouncement of its judgment the court would be governed to a considerable extent by the conduct of the defendants in the meantime. In October the court reviewed the previous proceedings and discovered that three of the defendants, after receiving copies of its written communication delivered in July, had continued to openly violate the court's order by intimidating employees. Three of the defendants were then found guilty.

If it be assumed that criticism is directed at the character of the order issued, that ground for objection, whatever it may be, is found now which apparently did not exist and was not made by the defendants at the time the order was issued. If the criticism is directed at the punishment for contempt, the record of the case discloses on the part of the court the most considerate conduct compatible with the enforcement of its authority.

Allis-Chalmers Co. v. Iron Moulders' Union.

(150 Fed., 155; 166 Fed., 45.)

The record in this case discloses that the application for a preliminary injunction was denied, the defendants' answer having substantially overcome the plaintiff. A supplementary application for injunction was filed three months later and granted after argument and hearing. The opinion showed the evidence disclosed picketing, accompanied by threats, intimidation, and much actual violence. The final decree was modified on appeal.

The criticism can not be said from the record of the case to disclose anything more than a defeated litigant's dissatisfaction with a decision of the court. The rights of the defendants are fully protected throughout by counsel, as the proceedings disclose, and the modification of the final decree shows the defendants in possession of an adequate remedy to correct trial error.

Pope Motor Car Co. v. Keegan.

(150 Fed., 148.)

The record discloses a temporary restraining order granted on the filing of complaint, with numerous affidavits and exhibits. Hearing on motion for preliminary injunction was had within eight days. At this proceeding argument was heard and oral evidence presented. A preliminary injunction was then allowed against such defendants as were shown to have participated in coercion and intimidation. The order is moderate in its terms and in the usual form, and the proceedings disclose the rights of defendants were fully protected by counsel and the court exceedingly strict in framing the order. Nothing can be found in the order or the proceedings not fully sustained by the uniform practice and decisions of the higher courts.

Nat'l Telephone Co. v. Kent.

(Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia, 156 Fed., 173.)

In this case an original and amended bill were filed. On the amended bill, exhibits, and affidavits a preliminary injunction was granted. The defendants demurred to the bill on the ground that sufficient cause for the preliminary injunction was not presented. The court overruled the demurrer, holding that a boycott then being prosecuted was illegal, and that a newspaper joined as a defendant could be restrained from publishing matter intended to carry on the boycott.

The position assumed by the court in this case is fully sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Gompers v. Buck's Stove & Range Co. (219 U. S., 340).

Rocky Mountain Bell Telephone Co. v. Montana Federation of Labor.

(Circuit Court of the United States, Ninth Circuit, District of Montana, 156 Fed., 189.)

The record discloses the injunction in this action was based upon a boycott directed against the telephone company during the course of a strike. The employees remaining in the service of the company were intimidated and assaulted, and by the same tactics others were prevented from entering its service, while a variety of abusive and threatening circulars were issued to merchants and business men, threatening the withdrawal of patronage from all merchants who used plantiff's telephone lines during the trade dispute. Especially threatening circulars were distributed among plaintiff's actual female employees and applicants for employment.

The law of this case is fully sustained by familiar decisions of long standing, and the facts disclose a distressing condition in which women no less than men were subjected to threats and violence. It is a case which exceptionally justifies the issuance of an injunction, and, indeed, presents the writ in most beneficent operation.

Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. John Mitchell.

This case has been the subject of especial criticism, and was the occasion of a resolution by the Senate. The facts have been so continuously misrepresented that it is worthy of special consideration. In this case a restraining order was issued on the 24th of October, 1907, the last day of the court at the place of issuance, and set for hearing on the first day of the next term of court in that district, January 14, 1908. On that date counsel for defendants entered a motion to dismiss as to certain defendants not served with process, and asked for a continuance, which was granted until March 18, 1908, on which date counsel for defendants again asked a postponement, which was had at their instance until May 26, at which time further request for continuance by the defendants was refused and motion for a temporary injunction heard and granted, the counsel for defense stating "they did not desire to be heard in opposition to said motion, so far as the granting of a temporary injunction at the time was concerned, and not consenting, but objecting thereto."

So far, therefore, as the injunction in this case is criticized because of the lapse of time between its issuance and the hearing thereon, it must be evident that the critic makes a complaint which was not shared by counsel for the defense, who continued to cause the case of their own clients to be postponed until the court refused to continue it further.

During the period which elapsed between the granting of the restraining order and the return thereon, counsel for the defense had it within their power, if they thought the interval too great, to make an application for the advancement of the hearing or to make a motion for the modification or vacation of the order, and had they taken such action and their motion been refused, they would have had under the existing statute a ground of appeal, which appeal would have had precedence.

But the record discloses not only that they made no effort to do any of these things, but they were unwilling to join issue at every subsequent hearing, and after months of delay caused by their repeated requests for continuance, they offered no argument or motion on hearing.

As to the law in the case, it is indisputable with the facts disclosed. It appears that the Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. were owners of about 5,000 acres of coal lands equipped with a plant which produced about 1,400 tons of coal per day. The company had on hand at the time of this action contracts for future delivery to its full capacity. Prior to April, 1906, the company operated its mines under a trade agreement with members of the United Mine Workers. On that date a strike was ordered by that union, and the members thereof who were employees of the Hitchman Co. quit their employment. The evidence discloses that they distinctly stated they had no grievance against the plaintiff, but the strike order was issued on account of a difficulty with coal operators in another section of the country.

The plaintiff offered at this time, if the men would remain at work, to pay an advance in wages from and after April 1 that might be agreed to by the other coal operators with whom the United Mine Workers were at odds, but the men were not allowed to return to work on this condition. It then appears that for two months following the company was unable to operate its plant. Thereupon, being unable to effect an arrangement with its union employees, it began to employ nonunion men, and in order to protect itself against a repetition of the conditions which had resulted in the stopping of its operations, it required each new employee to agree not to join the United Mine Workers, a contract which they were entitled to require as a matter of legal right and which under the circumstances was justified by their experience as a matter of expediency.

Under these circumstances the United Mine Workers undertook by threats, intimidation, and persuasion to cause the new employees who had entered into the contract referred to, to violate that contract and join their union. These are the facts which the pleadings and the record disclose. Under these circumstances the injunction issue for the purpose of protecting the plaintiffs in the exercise of their right to employ such labor as they saw fit and to make and be protected in a contract which by expensive experience they had learned to be essential to the uninterrupted operation of their plant. The defendant mine workers undertook to procure a breach of these contracts, endeavored to reunionize the works and subject their control and operation to the will and policies of the union.

Surely nothing is more clearly settled than that equity will intervene to protect the inviolability of a contract against the malicious interference of third parties. This is precisely the point upon which the Supreme Court of the United States decided the case of Bitterman v. Louisville & Nashville Railroad (207 U. S., 205). This was an action brought against a combination of scalpers undertaking to procure breaches of contract by passengers who had agreed not to resell tickets purchased from the plaintiff company. The court held it an actionable wrong when one "maliciously interferes in a contract between two parties" to induce one of them to break the contract to the injury of the other. The conspiracy of the scalpers was enjoined, the precise issue upon which the writ of injunction issued in the Hitchman case. This action illustrates perhaps better than any other can why labor organizations desire a different standard for the issuance of restraining orders to protect property rights in labor disputes from that which exists in other forms of litigation, for with such a standard of law established the injunction issued in the Bitterman case could not have issued in the Hitchman case.

Mr. EMERY. To return again to the manner in which the writ of injunction has been used in labor disputes, it has been frequently urged in argument here that the restraint of boycotts by injunction and the punishment of a boycotting combination criminally is a novel thing, an example in itself of the improper extension of the equity jurisdiction against which complaint may be justly made.

I know of no period of time in which the boycott has not been unlawful, and I beg to submit to the committee probably the oldest judicial record of a boycott. It is taken from a case decided in the year 1221 A. D., and entitled "The Abbot of Lilleshall v. The Bailiffs of Shrewsbury." The record was published by the Selden Society in 1877, and the translation of the old law Latin goes like this:

"The Abbot of Lilleshall complains that the bailiffs of Shrewsbury do him many injuries against his liberty, and that they have caused proclamation to be made in the town that none be so bold as to sell any merchandise to the abbot or his men upon pain of forfeiting 10 shillings, and that Richard Peche, the bedell of the said town, made this proclamation by their orders. And the bailiffs defend all of it, and Richard likewise defends all of it, and that he never heard of any such proclamation made by anyone. It is considered that he do defend himself twelve-handed (with 11 compurgators), and do come on Saturday with his law."

There, Mr. Chairman, in those 10 lines of that ancient complaint the principles and practices of the modern boycott are clearly set out. Of course the old word "defend" means "deny." You will observe that the abbot sets up in his complaint that the bailiffs by combination are doing injury "against his liberty"; the abbot is claiming the right to have trade flow unobstructed to and from him, and to deal freely with his fellows; and he is restrained by a combination which, for some purpose of its own, is undertaking to penalize anyone who deals with him. He says "they have caused proclamation to be made." This is the ancient form of the modern "We don't patronize" list, and the "bedell" is performing the functions committed to Mr. Gompers in our day. Finally, you will observe that all the acts complained of are admitted to be illegal by both the beadle and the bailiffs, because they deny committing them. They do not undertake, as do our modern boycotters, to assert the right to penalize anyone who deals with the object of their ostracism. They say, "We did not do it." The beadle says he did not make the proclamation and did not hear anyone make it. Of course the plaintiff, being a man of church, did not settle the controversy by gage of battle but by wager of law.

Mr. THOMAS. What was the punishment?

Mr. EMERY. The punishment appears to have been a fine. It appears that in this proceeding they were held to answer. The further result I can not ascertain.

Mr. THOMAS. They were fined to begin with?

Mr. EMERY. Yes; they were held to answer and fined. The record is obscure and does not show the ultimate fate of the action.

Mr. THOMAS. Did they determine how much the fine was?

Mr. EMERY. I do not know the amount.

The advocates of legislation of this character continually point to the labor legislation of England as a precedent for their proposals, and, particularly, to the trade disputes act of 1906. I think it important that the committee should have this legislation before them, and to that end I ask to file as a part of this argument the English trade disputes act of 1906 and the conspiracy and protection of property act of 1875. The former enactment, so frequently called to your attention, is in its major aspects an amendment of the latter, and it is impossible to understand the effect of the act of 1906 upon the criminal or civil liability of English workmen in trades disputes, unless the two measures are considered together. Is there any objection to my request?

Mr. MOON. Certainly not.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the acts referred to by you will be included as a part of your remarks and as a part of this hearing.

Mr. EMERY. They are as follows:

CONSPIRACY AND PROTECTION OF PROPERTY ACT, 1875, AND TRADE DISPUTES ACT, 1906.

[Ch. 86. An act for amending the law relating to conspiracy and to the protection of property, and for other purposes (Aug. 13, 1875).]

Be it enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. This act may be cited as the conspiracy and protection of property act, 1875.

2. This act shall come into operation on the 1st day of September, 1875.

Conspiracy and protection of property.

3. An agreement or combination by two or more persons to do or procure to be done any act in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute "between employers and workmen" [words "between employers and workmen" repealed by pt. 3, sec. 5, trade disputes act, 1906] shall not be indictable as a conspiracy if such act committed by one person would not be punishable as a crime.

An act done in pursuance of an agreement or combination by two or more persons shall, if done in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute, not be actionable unless the act, if done without any such agreement or combination, would be actionable.

Nothing in this section shall exempt from punishment any persons guilty of a conspiracy for which a punishment is awarded by any act of Parliament.

Nothing in this section shall affect the law relating to riot, unlawful assembly, breach of the peace, or sedition, or any offense against the state or the sovereign.

A crime for the purposes of this section means an offense punishable on indictment, or an offense which is punishable on summary conviction, and for the commission of which the offender is liable under the statute making the offense punishable to be imprisoned either absolutely or at the discretion of the court as an alternative for some other punishment.

Where a person is convicted of any such agreement or combination as aforesaid to do or procure to be done an act which is punishable only on summary conviction, and is sentenced to imprisonment, the imprisonment shall not exceed three months, or such longer time, if any, as may have been prescribed by the statute for the punishment of the said act when committed by one person.

4. Where a person employed by a municipal authority or by any company or contractor upon whom is imposed by act of Parliament the duty, or who have otherwise assumed the duty, of supplying any city, borough, town, or place, or any part thereof, with gas or water, willfully and maliciously breaks a contract of service with that authority or company or contractor, knowing or having reasonable cause to believe that the probable consequences of his so doing, either alone or in combination with others, will be to deprive the inhabitants of that city, borough, town, place, or part wholly or to a great extent of their supply of gas or water, he shall on conviction thereof by a court of summary jurisdiction, or on indictment as hereinafter mentioned, be liable either to pay a penalty not exceeding £20 or to be imprisoned for a term not exceeding three months, with or without hard labor.

Every such municipal authority, company, or contractor as is mentioned in this section shall cause to be posted up, at the gas works or waterworks, as the case may be, belonging to such authority or company or contractor, a printed copy of this section in some conspicuous place where the same may be conveniently read by the persons employed, and as often as such copy becomes defaced, obliterated, or destroyed shall cause it to be renewed with all reasonable dispatch.

If any municipal authority or company or contractor make default in complying with the provisions of this section in relation to such notice as aforesaid, they or he shall incur on summary conviction a penalty not exceeding £5 for every day during which such default continues, and every person who unlawfully injures, defaces, or covers up any notice so posted up as aforesaid in pursuance of this act shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding 40 shillings.

5. Where any person willfully and maliciously breaks a contract of service or of hiring, knowing or having reasonable cause to believe that the probable consequences of his so doing, either alone or in combination with others, will be to endanger human life, or cause serious bodily injury, or to expose valuable property, whether real or personal, to destruction or serious injury, he shall, on conviction thereof by a court of summary jurisdiction, or on indictment as hereinafter mentioned, be liable either to pay a penalty not exceeding £20 or to be imprisoned for a term not exceeding three months, with or without hard labor.

Miscellaneous.

6. Where a master, being legally liable to provide for his servant or apprentice necessary food, clothing, medical aid, or lodging, willfully and without lawful excuse refuses or neglects to provide the same, whereby the health of the servant or apprentice is or is likely to be seriously or permanently injured, he shall, on summary conviction, be liable either to pay a penalty not exceeding £20 or to be imprisoned for a term not exceeding six months, with or without hard labor.

7. Every person who, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing or to do any act which such other person has a legal right to do or abstain from doing, wrongfully and without legal authority—

1. Uses violence to or intimidates such other person or his wife or children or injures his property; or

2. Persistently follows such other person about from place to place; or

3. Hides any tools, clothes, or other property owned or used by such other person, or deprives him of or hinders him in the use thereof; or

4. Watches or besets the house or other place where such other person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be, or the approach to such house or place; or shall, on conviction thereof by a court of summary jurisdiction, or on indictment as hereinafter mentioned, be liable either to pay a penalty not exceeding £20 or to be imprisoned for a term not exceeding three months, with or without hard labor.

5. Follows such other person with two or more other persons in a disorderly manner in or through any street or road—

NOTE.—Last paragraph of this section repealed by second paragraph, second section, trade-disputes act, 1906. "Attending at or near the house or place where a person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be, or the approach to such house or place, in order merely to obtain or communicate information, shall not be deemed a watching or besetting within the meaning of this section."

8. Where in any act relating to employers or workmen a pecuniary penalty is imposed in respect of any offense under such act, and no power is given to reduce such penalty, the justices or court having jurisdiction in respect of such offense may, if they think it just so to do, impose by way of penalty in respect of such offense any sum not less than one-fourth of the penalty imposed by such act.

Legal proceedings.

9. Where a person is accused before a court of summary jurisdiction of any offense made punishable by this act and for which a penalty amounting to £20 or imprisonment is imposed the accused may, on appearing before the court of summary jurisdiction, declare that he objects to being tried for such offense by a court of summary jurisdiction, and thereupon the court of summary jurisdiction may deal with the case in all respects as if the accused were charged with an indictable offense and not an offense punishable on summary conviction, and the offense may be prosecuted on indictment accordingly.

10. Every offense under this act which is made punishable on conviction by a court of summary jurisdiction or on summary conviction, and every penalty under this act recoverable on summary conviction may be prosecuted and recovered in manner provided by the summary jurisdiction act.

11. Provided, that upon the hearing and determining of any indictment or information under sections 4, 5, and 6 of this act, the respective parties to the contract of service, their husbands or wives, shall be deemed and considered as competent witnesses.

12. In England or Ireland, if any party feels aggrieved by any conviction made by a court of summary jurisdiction on determining any information under this act the party so aggrieved may appeal therefrom, subject to the conditions and regulations following:

(1) The appeal shall be made to some court of general or quarter sessions for the county or place in which the cause of appeal has arisen, holden not less than 15 days and not more than 4 months after the decision of the court from which the appeal is made.

(2) The appellant shall, within seven days after the cause of appeal has arisen, give notice to the other party and to the court of summary jurisdiction of his intention to appeal, and of the ground thereof.

(3) The appellant shall immediately after such notice enter into a recognizance before a justice of the peace, with or without sureties, conditioned personally to try such appeal, and to abide the judgment of the court thereon, and to pay such costs as may be awarded by the court.

(4) Where the appellant is in custody the justice may, if he think fit, on the appellant entering into such recognizance as aforesaid, release him from custody.

(5) The court of appeal may adjourn the appeal, and upon the hearing thereof they may confirm, reverse, or modify the decision of the court of summary jurisdiction, or remit the matter to the court of summary jurisdiction with the opinion of the court of appeals thereon, or make such other order in the matter as the court thinks just, and if the matter be remitted to the court of summary jurisdiction the said last-mentioned court shall thereupon rehear and decide the information in accordance with the opinion of the said court of appeal. The court of appeal may also make such order as to costs to be paid by either party as the court thinks just.

An act to provide for the regulation of trades-unions and trade disputes. [December 21, 1906.]

[6 Edw. VII, ch. 47.]

Be it enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

I. The following paragraph shall be added as a new paragraph after the first paragraph of section 3 of the conspiracy and protection of property act, 1875:

"An act done in pursuance of an agreement or combination by two or more persons shall, if done in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute, not be actionable unless the act, if done without any such agreement or combination, would be actionable."

II. 1. It shall be lawful for one or more persons, acting in their own behalf or on behalf of a trade-union or of an individual employer or firm in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute, to attend at or near a house or place where a person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be, if they so attend merely for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or abstain from working.

2. Section 7 of the conspiracy and protection of property act, 1875, is hereby repealed from "attending at or near" to the end of the section.

III. An act done by a person in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute shall not be actionable on the ground only that it induces some other person to break a contract of employment or that it is an interference with the trade, business, or employment of some other person, or with the right of some other person to dispose of his capital or his labor as he wills.

IV. 1. An action against a trade union, whether of workmen or masters, or against any members or officials thereof on behalf of themselves and all other members of the trade union in respect of any tortious act alleged to have been committed by or on behalf of the trade union, shall not be entertained by any court.

2. Nothing in this section shall affect the liability of the trustees of a trade union to be sued in the events provided for by the trades-union act, 1871, section 9, except in respect of any tortious act committed by or on behalf of the union in contemplation or in furtherance of a trade dispute.

V. 1. This act may be cited as the trade disputes act, 1906, and the trade-union acts, 1871 and 1876, and this act may be cited together as the trade-union acts, 1871 to 1906.

2. In this act the expression "trade union" has the same meaning as in the trade-union acts, 1871 and 1876, and shall include any combination as therein defined, notwithstanding that such combination may be the branch of a trade union.

3. In this act and in the conspiracy and protection of property act, 1875, the expression "trade dispute" means any dispute between employers and workmen, or between workmen and workmen, which is connected with the employment or nonemployment, or the terms of the employment, or with the conditions of labor, of any person, and the expression "workmen" means all persons employed in trade or industry, whether or not in the employment of the employer with whom a trade dispute arises; and, in section 3 of the last-mentioned act, the words "between employers and workmen" shall be repealed.

Mr. EMERY. With the indulgence of the committee, let me briefly call its attention to the condition of law and fact out of which the English legislation grew. I shall not take up your time with a discussion of the niceties of the common-law doctrine of conspiracy in its application to trade unions prior to the nineteenth century, a subject upon which scholars of the Temples are still divided, but from 1800 to 1824 a series of enactments known as the "combination acts" practically outlawed trade unions, making unlawful by statute any organization to fix wages.

In 1824 the combination acts were repealed and the widest privilege given to organizations of workmen by a statute of that year. This, however, exciting general alarm, was repealed in 1825, leaving the common law in force. Combinations of either masters or workmen to raise or depress wages were, in common-law proceedings between this period and 1870, held unlawful and sometimes criminal as in restraint of trade (Regina v. Druitt, 10 Cox C. C., 592; Hilton v. Eckersley, 6 E. and B., 47), while a combination to strike and a concerted withdrawal from employment were declared criminal. This doctrine undoubtedly survived from the legislation beginning with the statute of labors in 1349, in which the state asserted the right to fix wages, and consequently a combination to raise or depress them would be a conspiracy against the law.

During this period such labor organizations as existed suffered under the disadvantage of being unable to protect their own funds, because apart from the question of criminal responsibility they were deemed illegal organizations, as some of their purposes were held to be in restraint of trade. They could not therefore maintain an action in court, and thus a treasurer or other agent of the organization who embezzled its funds or retained them could not be proceeded against. (Hornby v. Close, L. R., 2 Q. B., 153, 1867; Farrer v. Close, L. R., 4 Q. B., 602, 1869.)

Great as were these disabilities of the trade union as an organization, the disabilities of the individual workmen were even greater at this period. For at common law, enforced in later years by a variety of statutes, a breach of contract on the part of the laborer was regarded as a criminal offense, while on the part of the master it was only a civil wrong. This condition grew out of ancient legislation beginning with the statute of labors in the fourteenth century, reenforced by the statute of apprentices in the seventeenth century, and strengthened by various enactments of the four Georges, which made it a criminal offense for a workman to depart from his service before the time agreed upon, or before the work he had undertaken was completed. Parliamentary returns in 1863 showed 10,000 cases of breach of contract prosecuted in the courts in a single year. At that time, and even under Lord Elcho's act of 1867, which undertook to remedy this condition, a contract of service could be specifically enforced. Even under Lord Elcho's act, which was avowedly remedial legislation, imprisonment for breach of contract of service remained to be enforced by a justice of the peace in "aggravated" cases.

These were the conditions which demanded parliamentary reform in England in the interest of workmen. Their counterpart never existed in this country. Neither the individual nor the organized workman has ever labored under these disadvantages here. A breach of contract has never been criminally punishable, and even in the earliest period of the trade-union movement in this country, when we were most affected by the English legal example in Pennsylvania, New York, and Virginia, the simple right to collectively withdraw from employment in furtherance of a lawful demand for changed condition of employment was always sustained by the courts.

But in England, until the passage of the trade-union acts of 1871 and 1876, workmen could not be said to have a legal right to organize or act collectively. Those statutes gave the trade-unions a limited legal right of existence by declaring "The purposes of any trade union shall not by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade be deemed to be unlawful so as to render any member of such trade union liable to criminal prosecution for conspiracy or otherwise." This, and this alone, removed the ancient disabilities of the common law and the statutes. But on the same day of the passage of the trade-union act of 1871, there was likewise enacted the criminal-amendments act, which defined as criminal offenses all those acts of intimidation or coercion common to trade disputes.

This act was succeeded by the conspiracy and protection of property act of 1875, which displaced it. The act of 1875 was brought into being largely as the result of the decision in Regina v. Bunn (12 Cox C. C., 316), being a strike of gas stokers in the year 1872 against a London gaslight company. The men were prosecuted and convicted of conspiracy because of their joint breach of contract. This case made it evident that while other disabilities had been removed a strike in any form was still prosecutable as a conspiracy at common law, and to overcome this condition and permit a joint withdrawal from employment the section of the act of 1875, so frequently referred to here, was passed, providing "that an agreement between two persons to further a trade dispute should not be indictable as a conspiracy if the act when committed by one person would not be punishable as a crime." The legislative history of this act and the subsequent decisions of English courts showed that this provision of the act of 1875 had no other purpose than to permit men to jointly withdraw from employment without being indictable for conspiracy.

But this section I describe is not left to stand alone, but is subjected to very many exceptions, which by examining the act you will perceive greatly modify and limit its apparent privilege.

Nothing in it exempts from punishment any person guilty of conspiracy, for which a punishment is awarded by act of Parliament. Nor does it affect the law relating to riot, unlawful assembly, breach of peace, or sedition. And, further, you will observe that in section 7 it is provided "every person who with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing or to do any act which such other person has a legal right to do or abstain from doing, wrongfully and without legal authority—

"1. Uses violence to or intimidates such other person or his wife or children, or injures his property; or

"2. Persistently follow such other person about from place to place; or

"3. Hides any tools, clothes, or other property owned or used by such other person, or deprives him of or hinders him in the use thereof; or

"4. Watches or besets the house or other place where such other person resides or works or carries on business, or happens to be, or the approach to such house or place; or

"5. Follows such other person with two or more other persons in a disorderly manner in or through any street or road, may be imprisoned for a term not exceeding three months at hard labor or a fine not exceeding £20."

This is the law of England to-day, but more than that, and to this I especially direct the attention of the committee, the fourth section of the conspiracy and protection of property act of 1875, frequently enforced, makes it a criminal offense, punishable by £20 fine or three months at hard labor, for any person employed by a gas or water company to willfully break his contract of service, alone or in combination with others, if he have reasonable cause to believe that the probable consequence of his so doing will deprive some section of the community of gas or water; and the fifth section provides, under the same penalty, that if any person, in any employ, either by himself or in combination with others, willfully breaks his contract of employment, having reasonable cause to believe that his doing so will endanger human life or cause serious bodily injury or expose valuable real or personal property to destruction or serious injury, he is criminally punishable. These extraordinary criminal provisions, utterly unknown to the law of this country, would not, I submit to you, be accepted by any labor leader who is asking you to enact the principles of English labor legislation.

The English trade-dispute act of 1906, which you will observe by examination is partially an amendment of the conspiracy and protection of property act of 1875, permits under strict limitations "picketing" for observation only. The chief and most striking change in the civil law which it produced was to relieve the funds of a trade union from liability for the acts of its agents when done in furtherance of a trade dispute. So that in the matter of tort liability under these conditions, the British trade union is a privileged character. Thus, in an action for malicious prosecution by an advertising agent against the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (Bussy v. Society of Amalgamated Railway Servants, 24 T. L. R., 437, 1908) the court held that the statute of 1906 protected the funds of the trade union against any action in tort, and remarks, "From the humiliating position of being on a level with other lawful associations of His Majesty's subjects the statute of 1906 has relieved all registered trade unions, and they are now supra legens, just as the medieval emperors were supra grammaticum. The defendant societies are therefore entitled to judgment."

Let me give the committee one further example. I contend that it is the purpose of the second section of the pending bill to give precisely this privilege and special exemption from the law to agreements growing out of trade disputes, but before I call the committee's attention to the fundamental differences between the power of Parliament and that of Congress to arbitrarily confer such special privileges upon any selected class of citizens, let me offer you an example of the terrible injustice which such legislation can work upon the laborer who most needs protection from the terrible coercive power of a trade-union directing its whole force against the object of its displeasure. There appears in the English court of appeals cases that of Conway v. Wade, decided on July 17, 1908. The facts are thus stated by Mr. Justice Farwell: "The facts are simple. For 18 years the plaintiff has been a member of the laborers' union intermittently. Seven years ago he was fined 10s., but did not pay, and no action was ever taken against him for such default.

"In September, 1907, he rejoined the union and got his card of membership and showed his receipt to the defendant on September 25, who told him that it was all right and that he could go to work. On October 1 he was given higher wages as charge man. On October 2 the defendant told Baines, the foreman, that he had better stop the plaintiff or there would be trouble with the men, and he did so. The defendant is a district delegate of the laborers' union; he is not a laborer. It was no part of his duty to inflict a fine or to stop any man from working; he had no authority to call out the men without the sanction of the executive, and he had no such sanction. He gave no notice to the plaintiff, nor did he suggest that he pay the 7-year-old fine. There were two members of the union—Mullen and Greene—in the same town. Mullen, having been secretary of the branch to which the plaintiff's fine should have been paid, instigated the defendant to get the plaintiff turned out; then another man—Linney, a ship steward—told the foreman that if the plaintiff kept in the men would stop. The plaintiff saw the defendant and remonstrated and asked him if he would stop him wherever he went. The defendant replied, 'Certainly. I will,' and the plaintiff said, 'Have I got to starve? What shall I do?' and the defendant replied, 'Do what you like.'

"The jury found that the defendant by his threats intended to and did prevent the plaintiff from getting or retaining employment in order to compel the plaintiff to pay the 10s., and to punish him for nonpayment. But, briefly, the case is this: The defendant, who is not a workingman at all and who had no authority on behalf of any trade-union or others to do so, threatened to call out the men at Redheads in order to compel payment of a fine more than 7 years old, of a trifling amount, the payment of which he was not entitled to demand, the nonpayment of which was no business of his, at the invitation of two workingmen who objected to the plaintiff. He so threatened, with the intention and effect of depriving the plaintiff of all work and chances of work, and contemplated with such complaisant indifference a result that the man would have to choose between starvation and the workhouse."

The jury gave damages to the plaintiff Wade and the appeal was on the question of whether or not the defendant's act was done in furtherance of a trade dispute, the court of appeal holding it was, and the plaintiff had no recourse. In expressing this conclusion Mr. Justice Farwell said, "It was possible for the court to defend individual liberty against the kings and barons because the defenses rested on the law which they administered; it is not possible for the courts to do so when the legislature alters the law, for they can only administer the law. The legislature can not make evil good, but it can make it not actionable."

"* * * I regret the conclusion, because I think that it inflicts a cruel hardship on the plaintiff, and it is no consolation for him that far greater hardships will doubtless be inflicted in the future on persons more innocent than himself, persons who were not able to pay 10s. seven years ago. To use Lord Justice Romere's language in Giblin v. National Amalgamated Laborers' Union (72 L. J. K. B., p. 914—1903, 2 K. B. at p. 620), 'The conduct of the defendant is morally an unjustifiable molestation of the man. * * * An improper and inexcusable interference with the man's ordinary rights of citizenship.' But these rights have been cut away and the remedy for them destroyed by the legislature."

On appeal the House of Lords held that there was not a trade dispute in this case, because the defendant Wade was not authorized to act by the union, but the Low Lords signified their assent to the conclusion that had he been acting under the direction of the union there would have been no liability for procuring the malicious discharge of the plaintiff in furtherance of the trade dispute. I submit to the committee that it is unthinkable that the American Congress could ever accept as precedent for its legislation a law which gave to either an individual or a combination the right to maliciously procure, without civil responsibility, the discharge and prevent the future employment of a workman because of his refusal to meet the improper demands of any individual or collection of individuals. This very bill before you seeks that end. It undertakes to provide in the second section that no act of two or more persons done in furtherance of a trade dispute shall make the parties criminally or civilly liable in order to protect such combinations from criminal or tort liability.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not desire to interfere with the line of your argument, but as I understand you, you say that the workmen have the right to strike?

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Then do you go further and say that those striking workmen have the right to picket; it is not contrary to law to picket?

Mr. EMERY. In any State in which there is no statute on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Not unless there is some State statute?

Mr. EMERY. If individuals without the menace of numbers go to a place where a strike is on merely for the purpose of obtaining information or peaceable communication with others, that is not unlawful.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a legal term, is it not, used in law books, "picketing" or "to picket"?

Mr. EMERY. But "picketing" has been given a variety of meanings. When indulged in by numbers that fact constitutes a menace frequently held illegal.

The CHAIRMAN. We understand "picketing" to mean that here are strikers and can they not persuade other people; to go where other people may be seeking to take the place of the strikers?

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without going upon the premises of the mill or factory, can they not in a peaceable way try to persuade other people not to accept the employment that the strikers have abandoned? That is not contrary to law, is it?

Mr. EMERY. Those things are qualified by a great many circumstances, Mr. Chairman, upon which the legality depends.

The CHAIRMAN. I said "peaceable" and "peaceful" and without any force.

Mr. EMERY. Yes. There arises in my mind a case within my personal experience occurring in California a few years ago where picketing was enjoined. It was the case of Pierce v. The Stablemen's Union, which afterwards went to the Supreme Court of the State of California and was sustained. In that case a livery stable was picketed during the course of a stablemen's strike, and during the hearing on the application for the injunction the captain of pickets testified on cross-examination that he had from 40 to 120 men constituting his picket line and patrolling up and down in front of the stable. The stable had a frontage of perhaps 75 feet on one of the principal streets of the city. The court held in that case, and very properly, that the picketing under the circumstances disclosed amounted to an obstruction of the street and the prevention of reasonable access to and from the stable being carried on under circumstances that intimidated not only those who remained at work or sought employment, but the actual and potential patrons of the stable. So you perceive that one definition of picketing may vary greatly from another.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose there were a thousand men on strike from one establishment and 10 of the strikers should be in the neighborhood of that factory or establishment, but not on the premises themselves, and they should proceed in a perfectly peaceful way without overawing the people who appeared to be going to take the place of strikers, and without using any threats or violence, just simply saying to them: "We wish you would not take our places; we are striking for an increase in wages"; or "We are striking for some other good reasons and we wish you would not go and take our places." There is nothing unlawful in that, is there?

Mr. EMERY. No, sir; not as you state it.

The CHAIRMAN. Have there not been cases where judges have issued injunctions and cited men for doing that very sort of thing?

Mr. EMERY. I do not know of an instance, Mr. Chairman. If you will show me one I should like to see it.

The CHAIRMAN. I am asking you for information.

Mr. EMERY. No, sir; I do not know of an injunction predicated upon the conditions you describe. You refer to cases in which injunctions have been issued?

The CHAIRMAN. I am seeking for information and I am just putting that as an illustration.

Mr. EMERY. Each of these cases has its special circumstance and of course the remedy in equity accommodates itself to the peculiar characteristics of each case.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, we understand that.

Mr. EMERY. Practically every case presents different circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. But it is an abuse in some cases—a possible abuse I might say—that has given rise to complaint?

Mr. EMERY. Have you a case in mind, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. No; I have not myself, because I live entirely in an agricultural community where we do not have strikes and lockouts.

Mr. EMERY. Perhaps you have had them on your railroads, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. No; I do not remember in my section of ever having any railroad strikes.

Mr. EMERY. I recall some two years ago a very serious strike on the Central Railroad of Georgia, caused, I believe, by the system of promoting negro firemen.

The CHAIRMAN. That was in Georgia. I do not believe that condition ever obtained in my section.

Mr. THOMAS. Have you any objection to men charged with contempt being tried by a jury?

Mr. EMERY. I discussed that question at some length and should dislike to further inflict myself upon the committee in regard to it.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not happen to be present when you discussed it.

Mr. EMERY. Pardon me. I do oppose trial by a jury in contempt cases.

Mr. THOMAS. Then you think a man charged with contempt does not have the same right that a man charged with murder has? He can be tried by a jury.

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir. There is no parallel between the cases.

Mr. THOMAS. You consider disobedience to a Federal injunction a graver charge than murder, do you?

Mr. EMERY. That is not implied. I think the Constitution of my country has provided two modes of procedure in the cases stated.

Mr. THOMAS. Is there any provision in the Constitution to the effect that a man tried for contempt may not be tried by a jury?

Mr. EMERY. I think that is the effect of a provision.

Mr. THOMAS. What is it?

Mr. EMERY. It is the well-known provision which extends the judicial power to all cases in law and equity.

Mr. THOMAS. In what way?

Mr. EMERY. If the gentleman will permit me, it would be very difficult to undertake a proper discussion of the issue which your inquiry raises under the circumstances of this hearing. I have fully expressed myself on that subject in an argument made before this committee.

While I desire to fully respond to the gentleman's inquiry, it is impossible to adequately do so at this time.

Mr. THOMAS. What you have said will be printed?

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I will read it.

Mr. EMERY. It has been printed.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you think that in no case have Federal judges in labor disputes abused the process of injunction?

Mr. EMERY. Do you mean by the word "abused," Mr. Chairman, made error in the issuance of a writ?

The CHAIRMAN. I mean more than that, that they have issued an injunction where they should not have issued it, and that they have done things under the injunction process that they ought not to have done.

Mr. EMERY. I must answer, Mr. Chairman, that I have examined every case I have heard criticized, but I know of none which sustains the charge that any Federal judge has abused his power.

No doubt Judge Jenkins made an error in issuing the injunction in the case of the Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. The Central Pacific Railroad, which Mr. Justice Harlan corrected in the decision in Arthur v. Oakes; but in that case no one can read the elaborate and learned opinion of Judge Jenkins without being impressed with his sincerity and sense of responsibility. His decision involved the rights of a receiver through whom the court was operating a carrier, and he was confronted with the then doubtful question of how far the court could go in protecting property under its control. It is possible, although I think it most infrequent, that there are cases in which errors have been made and fully corrected on appeal, but I know of no case, if one exists, where it may be said that a judge issuing an injunction has abused his power.

But, sir, if it were true that this committee had before it several instances of judicial error in the issuance of injunctions, that would no more justify depriving the Federal judiciary of the power to continue to issue them in labor disputes and give the requisite constitutional protection to civil and property rights there assailed than it would justify legislation depriving judges of their power to issue injunctive or other writs in other forms of litigation because error had been committed in granting them. Judges are but human and subject to the frailties of the intellect, which we recognize by providing courts of appeal. I know of no case, nor have I ever heard one presented, which justified the charge that one, much less many, Federal judges have misused their power to issue injunctions in trade disputes, and I am anxious to have any member of this committee, or any one present, cite a case which sustains the charges made.

The CHAIRMAN. I am sorry that we can not give you more time, Mr. Emery.

Mr. EMERY. Relying on the permission of the committee, I beg now to revert to the English legislation upon which we are informed the second section of this bill is predicated. I have endeavored to give you a brief résumé of the circumstances which led to the present English legislation, and I have undertaken to briefly indicate the character and consequence of the recent legislative privilege conferred upon English trade unions. Their funds, I have said, were under the trade disputes act of 1906 relieved from tort liability for the acts of their agents when done in furtherance of a trade dispute; but these peculiar and special privileges which, as the English courts have pointed out, place them in a position of legal superiority to all their fellow subjects, are granted by a Parliament without constitutional restraint, a Parliament which can not only confer special exemptions from the law upon any class in the community but upon any individual, and which can, and has many times in the past, placed disabilities upon individuals or classes of the King's subjects because of their industrial position, their religious belief, or any other reason that seemed good to the Parliament.

Mr. Bryce has very strikingly described the arbitrary powers of Parliament in the American Commonwealth, volume 1, page 32:

"The British Parliament has always been, was then, and remains now a sovereign and constituent assembly. It can make and unmake any law, change the form of government or the succession to the Crown, interfere with the courts of justice, and extinguish the most sacred and private rights of the citizen. Between it and the people at large there is no legal distinction, because the whole plenitude of the people's rights and powers reside in it, just as if the whole nation were present within the chamber where it sits. In point of legal theory it is the nation, being the historical successor of the folkmoot of our Teutonic forefathers. Both practically and legally it is to-day the only and sufficient depository of the authority of the nation, and is, therefore, within the sphere of law irresponsible and omnipotent."

So says the same author at another point:

"What are called in England constitutional statutes, such as Magna Charta, the Bill of Rights, the act of settlement, the acts of union with Scotland and Ireland, are merely ordinary laws, which could be repealed by Parliament at any moment in exactly the same way it can repeal the highway act or lower the duty on tobacco. * * * Parliament can abolish when it pleases any institution of the country, the Crown, the House of Lords, the established church, the House of Commons, Parliament itself." (Vol. 1, pp. 237–238.)

In the course of his dissenting opinion in the case of Robertson v. Baldwin (165 U. S.) Mr. Justice Harlan refers to these "profound differences between the American and so-called British constitution," and points out—

"No such powers have been given to or can be exercised by any legislative body organized under the American system. Absolute arbitrary power exists nowhere in this free land. The authority for the exercise of power by the Congress of the United States must be found in the Constitution. Whatever it does in excess of the powers granted to it, or in violation of the injunction of the supreme law of the land, is a nullity and may be so treated by every person. * * * If the Parliament of Great Britain, her Britannic Majesty assenting, should establish slavery or involuntary servitude, the courts would not question its authority to do so, and would have no alternative except to sustain legislation of that character. A very short act of Parliament would suffice to destroy all the guaranties of life, liberty, and property now enjoyed by Englishmen."

Even the proponents of this legislation must realize what would happen if Congress possessed and exercised the powers of the British Parliament, which this bill endeavors to excite into being. The very constitutional restrictions which they seek to overcome, and which they would have you disregard, are those which create the most marked distinction between American and British Governments, and give to the citizens of the one a security not possessed by the subjects of the other. Within the memory of living men these very comparisons have been exemplified. Our Constitution forbids the passage of bills of attainder. Following the War of the Rebellion the Supreme Court of the United States was again and again called upon to protect the citizens of the States lately in rebellion against legislation amounting to acts of attainder growing out of the bitterness of the civil struggle. The British Parliament has passed, and may to this hour pass, bills of attainder, punishing unborn children for the alleged acts of their parents. Our Constitution guarantees a speedy trial to persons accused of crime. The Parliament may, and frequently has, authorized or permitted the indefinite imprisonment of individuals without trial, or even an accusation, and upon the mere suspicion of the executive. We forbid the taking of property without due process of law. The Parliament has and does arbitrarily confiscate private property without compensation. It is not within your power to pass ex post facto laws, but within your own memory certain Irish Parliamentary leaders were prosecuted, convicted, and imprisoned for making speeches made unlawful by act of Parliament after their delivery.

So, gentlemen of the committee, while it is true that English trade-unions enjoy special exemptions from the uniform operation of the law which it would not be possible to grant to members of trade-unions in this country without depriving other workmen who are not members of such organizations and other citizens generally of the equal protection of the law, it is equally true that the English legislation has grown out of special legal disabilities unknown to the American workmen and unusual circumstances of fact without parallel in this country.

But the legal privileges to which I referred are accompanied by legal disabilities which no trade-unionist of this country would care to accept. The British trade unions may not hold property, nor act through trustees, except it be registered under the trade-union act of 1871, and it has been frequently decided that that act is, as it were, the charter of combination for a registered trade union, and it can exercise no power not therein authorized. In this country a labor union is not required to incorporate or even assume any quasi corporate form. It remains a purely voluntary organization that may enforce any lawful rule upon its members, and it enjoys the fullest and freest rights of political activity. In Great Britain it was not long since decided in the case of the Amalgamated Society of Railroad Servants v. Osborne (House of Lords, July 21, 23, 28; Dec. 21, 1909) that a registered trade union can not lawfully apply its funds for the maintenance of members of Parliament to represent its interests. As a corollary to that judgment it was held in a very recent case (Wilson v. Amalgamated Society of Engineers, 2d Ch., Mar. 24, 1911) that as a trade union has no power to levy contributions upon its members for the purpose of securing parliamentary representation, they have, for like reasons, no power to levy contributions to secure representation on municipal and other local bodies other than boards of guardians. That is where the levy on the members is in effect compulsory. This decision, in express terms, leaves it an open question whether the Osborne case does not apply even to the administration of funds for parliamentary and municipal elections where the money is voluntarily subscribed by members of the union.

The point of all these comparisons between the legal conditions under which the British and American labor unions operate is that the legislative privileges conferred by the British Parliament upon British trade-unions are accompanied by legal and political disabilities which no American trade-union would accept. Yet the mode of argument adopted by the opponents of this legislation is to single out an exemption from the general law, conferred upon the British trade-unions, which it is not within the power of the American Congress to confer upon the members of the labor organizations in this country, without mentioning to the committee the various attendant disabilities accompanying these privileges and interwoven with them as a part of the complete legal system of trade-union regulation, the acceptance of which as a standard of legal right in this country no labor-union leader would dare to advocate in the presence of his own followers.

Let me now ask the committee to note the nature and circumstances of the equity jurisdiction exercised in labor disputes, observing that the rights protected are of the same character as those which are the object of remedial intervention by equity in every other known form of legal controversy; that, far from being a novel exercise of the powers of the chancellor, the principles involved are as ancient as any known to equity jurisprudence, nor do they protect merely the rights of employers, but they do, and in almost every instance of their exercise are required to, protect the equal rights and privileges of employees. Indeed, with respect to this last point I may observe in passing that two of the most prominent cases governing the use of injunctions in labor disputes are those of Plant v. Woods (176 Mass., 492) and Pickett v. Walsh (192 Mass., 572). In the first case one labor union is seeking protection from the intimidating and coercive action of another labor union which questioned and orthodoxy of the first; and in the second case individual nonunion men are seeking to be protected in their right to continue their employment against the efforts of a bricklayers' union to cause their employer to discharge them unless they join the defendant union.

Now, what the the rights for which injunctive protection is sought in the course of labor controversies? Let me refer for description to the language of Judge Gray in the famous report of the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission: "The right and liberty to pursue a lawful calling and to lead a peaceable life, free from molestation or attack, concerns the comfort and happiness of all men, and the denial of them means the destruction of one of the greatest, if not the greatest, of the benefits which the social organization confers."

Man's property in himself is the first and most elemental of all property rights, a fact this Nation recognized in the noblest manner by the emancipation of the slave. But a man owns the labor of his head no less than that of his hand; of his pen no less than his pick; his professional learning no less than his knowledge of a trade. Every exercise of mind or body possessing value is property as much as the coat on my back or the watch in my pocket, the house in which I live, or the land whose fruits sustain my life. Nay, more, we dispose of what we have and buy the possessions of others only through agreement; thus the most commonplace, and, indeed, socially, the most indispensable, of all property rights is that of contract. These rights of property are universally recognized, not more by the technical decisions of generations of judges than by the common sense of mankind. So it is evident by our daily experience, apparent in our customs, embodied in our law, confirmed by our courts, and the practical judgment of civilized mankind, of which we are a part, that not only are land and chattels property but the rights by which we acquire and dispose of them, use them for our own profit and our neighbor's benefits, as well as the peculiar qualities and powers of mind and body that may be turned to our pecuniary advantage—all are alike property and entitled to protection as such from whatever source they may be assailed.

Whenever we use land and structures in commerce and industry, whenever we exercise personal rights in connection with them and seek to acquire a name for skill in manufacture, honesty and enterprise in trading, that custom may accrue to us, that esteem which we secure in the minds of others because of the quality of our product, the character of our skill, the promptness with which we pay our debts, and those circumstances and incidents that contribute to give us reputation in the judgment of the buying public is a property right as valuable as store and factory and skill themselves, and we term it the good will of business.

All these circumstances in action constitute a going business, a thing in action of the most valuable nature, which has been thus graphically described by a great court of New Jersey:

"Business does not mean stock or machinery or capital and the like. While 'business' can be done without these, in commercial language it is as distinct from it as labor is from capital. In speaking of the business that may be done by a merchant, banker, or railroad company, the mind does not contemplate or dwell upon the character or quality of the means used, but of the operation, whether great or small, complex or simple, numerous or few, for one or the other of these conditions may arise from much or little stock or capital. In other words, 'business' does not mean dry goods, nor cash, nor iron rails and coaches. Business is not those lifeless and dead things but the activities in which they are employed. When in motion, then one is said to be in business; and then it is that merchants and others speak of the profits of business."

The importance of the right to do business was splendidly emphasized by the Hon W. G. BRANTLEY, a distinguished Democratic Member of the present House and former member of this committee, in a report made from the Judiciary Committee of the House on personal and property rights during the Fifty-ninth Congress. Mr. BRANTLEY said:

"It is well-nigh impossible, to my mind, to separate the right to do business from the business itself. It takes both to make a business. Financial loss, and perhaps bankruptcy and ruin, awaits every man who is denied the right to carry on the business in which his capital is invested."

The Wilson, Dingley, and Payne Tariff Acts each, in some of their provisions, recognize business as distinct from its tangible assets; so, too, the Sherman Act recognizes it by giving treble damages against violators of the act for injury done to business. So, too, you will find frequently cases in the Federal courts where ticket brokers have been enjoined from "scalping" railroad tickets on the ground that such conduct endangers the business of the railroad company by the interferences of these brokers or scalpers between the carrier and the original purchaser of the ticket, who is under contract not to resell it. This whole doctrine of restraint by injunction directed against third parties maliciously interfering with a business contract is fully set forth in a celebrated decision of the Supreme Court, Bitterman v. L. & N. Railroad (207 U. S., 222), and the committee will observe that the principle of law laid down there is the very one underlying and vindicating the interference of a court of equity in a labor dispute where there is a combination or conspiracy to procure or compel a breach of contract.

Now, all of these rights to which I refer are daily receiving equitable protection in every department of commercial litigation. Trademarks, copyrights, trade names, unfair competition, betrayal of trade secrets, nuisances affecting the use of property, the protection of trust funds against dissipation, injunctions against waste, all sorts of rights, accorded by contract; these and many uses of property and the exercise of property rights too numerous to mention are the commonplaces of daily protection by injunctive remedy predicated upon the recognition of the great truth that in the commercial world the right of greatest value and necessity is the right to carry on a lawful business without unlawful interruption. It is only when these same rights are menaced in labor disputes that their protection excites any criticism or seems to cause any confusion of mind amongst labor leaders or legislators.

True it is that wherever the injunctive writ is sought the applicant must disclose and the court must find, a condition of fact in which the rights to be protected are so circumstanced that unless the writ issues, the irreparable damage will be done and there is no adequate remedy at law. "But," says the proponents of this legislation, "if the criminal law be enforced in labor disputes against those acts which are said to frequently accompany disturbances of this nature, a remedy is at hand." In response to that it might first be observed that the second section of the proposed bill removes the most common acts and conspiracies in furtherance of trade disputes, from the reach of the criminal law. But even if the criminal law be left in its present form, I have never heard it seriously contended, nor do I know of any decision or any textbook which holds the enforcement of the criminal law to be an adequate remedy for a person injured as against the wrongdoer. To fine, imprison, or execute a criminal satisfies the outrage done to the community, but it never has been known to compensate the individual against whom the act is directed.

But the proponents of this bill further say that the wrongdoers may respond in damages; there is a remedy. It has always been held that where many individuals join in the commission of a wrong requiring a multiplicity of actions to recover compensation, and where even in that event many remain unknown or financially irresponsible, it can not be said that the remedy at law is adequate; and if it is not, the damage accomplished is certainly irreparable.

But finally let us assume the ordinary circumstances of an average strike, accompanied by picketing and boycotting, hour after hour and day after day, taking any of the numerous cases in Federal and State decisions as an example. We may find workmen intimidated going to and from work, customers threatened with boycott if they continue to deal with an individual against whom the strike is directed; and not only are the parties to the combination effectuating these things severally irresponsible, and often unidentifiable, but the wrongs they commit are multiplied each hour and each day, so that the injury and damage inflicted is of a continuing nature which a thousand suits at law, if they were maintainable, could no more adequately redress than an action directed against a cyclone or a thunderbolt. To these practical circumstances no man of ordinary experience can blind his vision. Thus it will be evident from an examination of any one of the adjudicated cases involving a labor dispute that there is frequently a combination of circumstances working injury in a thousand forms, for which civil actions in tort are as inadequate as an action against a mob.

You are told that innocent acts are frequently enjoined, but the "innocent acts" are always described without reference to the circumstance of their employment. "No conduct," said Mr. Justice Holmes, in Aikens v. Wisconsin (195 U. S.), "has such absolute privilege as to justify all possible schemes of which it may be a part. The most innocent and constitutionally protected of acts or omissions may be made a step in a criminal plot, and if it is a step in a plot neither its innocence nor the Constitution is sufficient to protect the punishment of the plot by law."

So the charge of enjoining innocent acts is always made without reference to the injunctive order in which they are alleged to have been restrained; or the order is presented and a phrase is taken here and there from its context and the charge pressed home by a superficial or fragmentary reading of particular injunctions. Thus I have noticed caustic criticisms of an order enjoining men from marching on the public highway, the critic making no reference to the fact that the defendants were so enjoined only if their purpose was to prevent other workmen equally entitled to the use of the highway from going to or returning from their work. It is frequently asserted that men are enjoined from "persuading" others to do or omit to do certain things, but I know of no order in which such a term is used except in connection with other phrases forbidding conduct of an unlawful character. Surely no rule of interpretation is better settled than that where a number of phrases are used, the concluding word of many terms is to be given construction as of the same general class as the previous phrases. Thus the word "persuasion" is sometimes used as a general inhibition of the kind of persuasion previously prohibited in a writ.

So, too, you are informed that injunctions are issued against acts which are crimes in order that through proceedings in contempt the persons committing such acts may be deprived of trial by jury. This charge, pressed with much plausibility, fades before the simple and easily made distinction between the various qualities present in every human act. The meanest man has no difficulty in realizing, for illustration, that every act of man has both a moral and a mental quality. The same act may conform to the laws of logic and violate the laws of morals. So, too, any act of one human being may, like a trespass, for instance, be at once the subject of criminal prosecution and a simultaneous civil action for damages. He who assaults another may be punished by the State for his crime and sued by the object of his wrongdoing for his tort. So an act forbidden by injunction may, when viewed through the spectacles of criminal law, likewise constitute a crime.

Said Mr. Justice Brewer in the Debs case (158 U. S., 595):

"The law is full of instances in which the same act may give rise to a civil action and a criminal action. An assault with intent to kill may be punished criminally under an indictment therefor or will support a civil action for damages, and the same is true of all other offenses which cause injury to persons or property. In such cases the jurisdiction of the civil court is invoked, not to enforce the criminal law and punish the wrongdoer, but to compensate the injured party for the damages which he or his property has suffered, and it is no defense to the civil action that the same act by the defendant exposes him also to indictment and punishment in a court of criminal jurisdiction. So here the acts of a defendant may or may not have been violations of the criminal law. If they were, that matter was for inquiry in other proceedings. The complaint made against them in this is of disobedience to an order of a civil court made for the protection of property and the security of rights. If any criminal prosecution be brought against them for the criminal offense alleged in the bill of complaint of derailing and wrecking engines and trains, assaulting and disabling employees of the railroad companies, it will be no defense to such prosecution that they disobeyed the orders of injunction served upon them and have been punished for such disobedience.

* * * * * * *

"In brief, a court enforcing obedience to its orders by proceedings for contempt is not exacting the criminal laws of the land but only securing to suitors the rights which it has adjudged them entitled to."

In the face of the demands made upon it, I beg this committee to ask, What is there in the nature of a labor dispute that should remove the persons and the rights involved from the same protection, the same remedies, the same constitutional guaranties that operate upon the same citizens in every other controversy? Is it that the right to a preventive remedy is in any sense inferior to the right to a compensatory remedy? Is the deterrence of wrong less important than its cure? The same great organic instrument of government confers jurisdiction in law and equity to the same court, in the same place, at the same time, and for the same purpose. The constitutional right to equitable remedies and procedure is equal in every respect to the right which each citizen possesses to the protection of a court of law. It is no less; it can be no more; nor can the right of any citizen be different from that of another citizen in similar circumstances; nor can a remedy be made to depend upon the character of the controversy and not upon the nature of the right assailed.

These propositions are self-evident. In this day and place they can require no elaboration of authority. I wish, therefore, to call to the attention of the committee but two cases on the general proposition of the right and duty of a court of equity to supply in labor disputes the protection which this legislation would destroy. The universal agreement of judicial authority on the points at issue is well stated in the case of Union Pacific R. R. Co. v. Ruef (120 Fed. Rep., 102), in which the court says:

"I have cited these authorities as being in part those which sustain the authority and duty to issue writs of injunction against violence to persons, against violence to property, against interference to business, against intimidation, and against the rights of contract and liberty. These authorities can not be reviewed within the limits of an opinion of reasonable length. The rules to be deduced, with but a single exception, can not be in doubt, and the authorities are not in conflict, and it does not matter whether we turn to the English cases or the Federal cases decided on the circuit, to the decision of the appellate courts of the United States, to the supreme courts of the several States, or to the textbooks, old or modern, we find a uniformity so remarkable as seldom to be found in other branches of our jurisprudence.

"They are all in favor of the rights of contract, of freedom, of the rights of property, and that no combination of men shall be allowed to interfere with another man, partnership, or corporation. The courts can not hope to entirely foreclose discussion of these questions, but discussion is already nearly at an end by the courts, and by those having the slightest knowledge of jurisprudence. And capitalists and employers of labor, and employees alike, must understand that they must go elsewhere than to the courts for other results, and if they can not go with confidence to the courts, it is because they desire to go without conscience, and knowing that they have a controversy without merit."

If the members of the committee would glance at the same rule of law applying to the boycott by a combination of employers and the boycott by a combination of workmen, let them examine the cases of Montague v. Lowry (193 U. S., 38) for the former and Lowee v. Lawler (208 U. S., 206) for the latter. And the committee will find, perhaps, much to its interest, that the counsel for the boycotting employers makes, in his brief, the same vain argument to the Supreme Court which underlies the second section of this bill; that is, that whatever one man has a lawful right to do a combination ought likewise to have a legal right to agree to do.

Finally, as the last expression upon the subject, we have the utterance of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Gompers v. Buck Stove & Range Co. (219 U. S.), where the court, fully recognizing the right of men to organize and act collectively, fully vindicates the right and duty of a court of equity to protect an individual in the lawful exercise of his rights against the coercion of a powerful labor combination.

In that decision, in which all the members of the court concurred, Mr. Justice Lamar says:

"The court's protective and restraining powers extend to every device whereby property is irreparably damaged or commerce is illegally restrained. * * *

"Society itself is an organization and does not object to organizations for social, religious, business, and all legal purposes. The law therefore recognizes the right of workingmen to unite and to invite others to join their ranks, thereby making available the strength, influence, and power that come from such association. By virtue of this right, powerful labor unions have been organized.

"But the very fact that it is lawful to form these bodies, with multitudes of members, means that they have thereby acquired a vast power, in the presence of which an individual may be helpless. This power when unlawfully used against one can not be met except by his purchasing peace at the cost of submitting to terms which involve the sacrifice of rights protected by the Constitution, or by standing on such rights and appealing to the preventative powers of a court of equity. When such appeal is made it is the duty of government to protect the one against the many, as well as the many against the one."

As the committee may be interested in examining the leading cases involving these propositions, I supply a list for their convenience:

Since the purpose of this measure is not merely to deprive Federal courts of the power of equitable intervention in trade disputes, but likewise to change the rule of the criminal law with respect to conspiracies and combinations acting in furtherance of such disputes, I ask this committee to recall that the criminal condemnation of the boycott was secured from the Supreme Court of the United States by labor organizations themselves. In 1887 several members of the musicians' union, then affiliated with the Knights of Labor, all being residents of this city, refused or neglected to pay a fine levied against them by the Musicians' Union. They were expelled from the union. Notice was served upon them that no member of the organization would work in any orchestra in which they were employed, and through the Knights of Labor this determination was sent over the country, and every theatrical manager and orchestra leader was informed that the employment of these men in any capacity would precipitate a strike. So complete was the combination against them that they were unable to secure work, whereupon they complained to the district attorney of this city against certain persons who had been chiefly instrumental in putting this terrible combination into operation against them, and the parties accused were indicted on a charge of conspiracy. The indictment shows that the combination not only undertook to prevent them from securing work as musicians, but from securing employment in any capacity whatever.

The defendants were tried in the police court of this city without a jury and found guilty, whereupon Mr. Jackson H. Ralston, now counsel for Messrs. Gompers, Mitchell, and Morrison, applied to the Supreme Court of the United States for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of Callam, one of the defendants then in the custody of the marshal, on the ground that the offense with which the defendant was charged was of so "heinous" a character that he was constitutionally entitled to a trial by jury.

Mr. Justice Harlan, in an elaborate opinion, concurred in by all his colleagues, held the point well taken and declared that the conspiracy of which the defendant was a party, to wit, a boycott directed against the employment of certain individuals, was an offense of so "heinous" a character that the defendant was entitled to a trial by jury. (Callam v. Wilson, 127 U. S., 540.)

Now, sirs, in conclusion, what is the purpose of this remarkable legislative proposal? No man can be familiar with contemporary events, nor with the trend of judicial decisions and statute law, without realizing that this is a deliberate effort to legalize combinations and conspiracies of a kind condemned, not only by the decisions of every State court of last resort, of every Federal court, of the Supreme Court of the United States, but likewise by the moral judgment of mankind.

At one stroke this measure would deprive the victim of the boycott, whether employer or employee, of the protection of the courts of law and equity and the criminal statutes which even now, in many instances, fail to effectually shield either the business man or the laborer from persecution and grievous injury and injustice. It is intended, and would, were it constitutional, validate the various assaults upon personal liberty and private property so eloquently and powerfully described in the report of Anthracite Coal Strike Commission, composed of both employers and representatives of organized labor:

"It becomes," said that body, "our duty to condemn another less violent, but not less reprehensible form of attack upon those rights and liberties of the citizens which the public opinion of civilized countries recognizes and protects. The right and liberty to pursue a lawful calling, and to lead a peaceable life, free from molestation or attack, concerns the comfort and happiness of all men, and the denial of them means destruction of one of the greatest, if not the greatest, of the benefits which the social organization confers. What is popularly known as the boycott (a word of evil omen and unhappy origin) is a form of coercion by which a combination of many persons seek to work their will upon a single person, or upon a few persons, by compelling others to abstain from social or beneficial business intercourse with such person or persons."

The rights of 30,000,000 wage earners, seeking to earn their living under the conditions that please them best, are to be subjected to the coercion of 2,000,000 of their fellows, demanding that membership in the organizations which they control shall be a prerequisite to the exercise of the right to work without molestation or persecution. Thousands of employers engaged in every form of commerce and industry are to be left without legal remedy whenever they become the objects of attack, upon refusal to grant the demands of combinations possessing, in furtherance of trade disputes, the peculiar privileges to commit crime without punishment and damage without liability, which this measure promises. The power to issue injunctions, to protect personal liberty and property rights, is to be withdrawn from the courts of the United States and practically lodged in a labor federation issuing its own injunctions against employer and workmen, requiring them to conduct their business and earn their livelihood under conditions which the federation demands, and contempt of such orders is to be punished through the coercive influence of the combination, operating through its agents in every State in the Union and in every great city of those States.

The will of such a combination, unrestrained by legal remedy, civil liability or criminal responsibility, is to succeed the law of the land, and great combinations and conspiracies which have hitherto obstructed the movement of commerce or undertaken to fix the conditions of production and employment only to be met by the protecting shield of the law, or to find it withdrawn from the form of their victim. The public, no less than the private interests, would be at the mercy of such privileged assailants. The very States of the Union, impotent to obstruct interstate commerce, would find themselves inferior in power to mere voluntary associations of individuals promulgating, without restraint, rules for the conduct of interstate commerce which no sovereign State could issue. And such privileges are demanded at the very hour when the public mind has been amazed and shocked by an astounding confession that has revealed a vast labor combination operating in many States, and through many agents, and using the highest forms of physical force that modern science can place at the command of man for the purpose of compelling a great industry to conduct its operations under conditions demanded by that combination, or suffer continuous assaults upon the lives of its workmen and the most destructive attacks upon its property—attacks which, for reckless disregard of the safety of the general public, are probably without parallel in the history of crime.

We ask this committee not merely to reject but to rebuke the demands represented in this legislation. We submit to the committee that the measure is manifestly unconstitutional:

1. Because it undertakes to deprive the courts of the United States of an inherent equity jurisdiction.

2. Because it undertakes to deprive citizens engaged in labor disputes of fundamental, civil, and property rights guaranteed by the Constitution, and which can not be taken from them without a denial of due process of law.

3. Because it undertakes to make constitutional remedies and constitutional rights dependent for their use and protection upon the character of the controversy in which they are involved, and not upon the nature of the right itself.

4. It undertakes to arbitrarily deprive one class of citizens of rights to which they are equally entitled with every other class of citizens.

5. It undertakes in labor disputes to arbitrarily exempt one class of citizens from the uniform operation of the civil and criminal laws of the United States.

6. The English legislation suggested as precedent for this bill is without authority because of profound constitutional differences between the organic laws of Great Britain and the United States, and for the further reason that as a matter of history and fact the British legislation proceeds from special and peculiar circumstances and considerations and is accompanied by inseparable legal disabilities having no counterpart in this country.

Finally, were this measure free from constitutional objection its practical operation would irreparably injure the public and private interest. It would encourage the lawless, breed civil strife and disorder, withdraw protection from the law-abiding and be a lasting stigma upon the legislature which enacted it and the country which endured it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I now yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the subject the House has under discussion to-day is in no sense a new one. It has been fruitful of discussion and debate in this and other forums for at least 20 years. It has formed the subject of declarations in party platforms, and not since, but frequently, has been alluded to in presidential messages. I congratulate the Democratic Party that an opportunity has now come to it to present genuine constructive legislation on this mooted topic and that it is prepared to grasp it. [Applause.]

Until I listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON], I thought I had some knowledge of both the origin and the history of this measure, some familiarity with its provisions and the reasons for them. I listen always to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman with great respect, and for his judgment I have so high an estimate that I distrust my own whenever I am forced to differ from him. In this instance, however, I do not only differ from his views on this matter, but I draw consolation rather than discouragement from his remarks, and treating them as an epitome of the worst which can be said against the pending bill I am confirmed in my belief in its justice and its equity.

Within the short space of time at my disposal I can not hope to fully cover so broad a subject. I must, therefore, address myself principally to a reply to the suggestions which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON] has offered in opposition to this bill. The temptation to interrupt him in the course of his remarks was strong, but I refrained because I realized the impossibility of making a connected legal argument under such interruptions, and I must, therefore, claim for myself the same privilege which was justly claimed by him.

The history of government in America, Mr. Speaker, is written in phrases; an idea finds lodgment in the public mind; a wrong burns itself into the national consciousness; an aspiration communicates itself from soul to soul, until the pulse of the Nation is stirred by a common desire; but the wrong is not righted; the idea is not transmuted into action; the aspiration is unrealized until some happy phrase crystallizes public opinion and progress and reform result. So with the phrase "Government by injunction." In themselves the words are meaningless enough, for an injunction is necessarily a form of government; it is the direct exercise of govermental power by the judicial branch, and as such is as legitimate and as necessary as the making of laws by the legislature or their enforcement by the executive.

The legislator enacts the statutes, the executive gives his orders, and the judge, in a proper case, issues his injunction against the parties before him—all alike are necessary functions of government. But as a shiboleth and a slogan, the phrase has come to mean vastly more. It is the expression of a long-standing complaint, which with many has ripened into a deep-seated conviction, that the writ of injunction has been carelessly, if not wrongfully used; that it has been turned to purposes beyond its proper scope; and that an evil has sprung up which calls for legislative action. If, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON], in substance asserts, this complaint is the mere clamor of restless lawlessness, if this conviction is the mere prejudice of disappointed litigants, if it is simply the murmur of discontent from those against whom the processes of the law have been rightfully invoked, then we owe it to the country and to ourselves to disregard it and to dismiss the subject as one not calling for our attention. But if the complaint, both in origin and in volume, commands our respect, if instances of abuse in the use of this writ, in fact, exist, we shall fall short of our duty if we fail to discover these abuses and seek to correct them. Nor does it strengthen the argument on the part of the minority to assert that the only purpose of the bill now offered as their substitute and of the presidential messages upon which it purports to be based, is to still this clamor by a mere pretense of remedy.

Those who do not believe that party platforms are mere bait to catch gudgeons must feel themselves bound, no matter upon which side of this House they may sit, to legislate upon this subject. The Democratic Party in its platforms of 1896, 1900, 1904, and 1908 has promised this relief, and in the year 1908 the Republican Party, following as usual the Democratic lead, made a grudging and belated declaration to the same effect. From 1896 to this Congress the Republican Party has enjoyed undisputed control of both Houses of Congress and of the Presidency, and in all that time has put upon the statute books no word of remedial legislation on this matter. Yet I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it was not in the year 1910, or even in 1909, that this subject was first called to the attention of Congress.

A Republican President, with whose remedies in the matter of court procedure I am fortunately not compelled to agree, called it to the attention of the Congress on the 5th day of December, 1905; on the 3d day of December, 1906; on the 3d day of December, 1907; on the 31st day of January, 1908; on the 25th day of March, 1908; and on the 18th day of December, 1908. His successor, taking a leaf from his book, recommended action in his messages of the 7th day of December, 1909, and of the 6th day of December, 1910. All of these messages fell upon deaf ears. Yet in them, over and over again, it was declared upon the authority of no less a person than the Chief Executive of the United States that these abuses did exist and that Congress should search for and apply the remedy. I have not time to quote in full the substance of any of these messages. A few sentences from some of them may be interesting. In his message of December 3, 1906, President Roosevelt said:

> There must be no hesitation in dealing with disorder. But there must likewise be no such abuse of the injunctive power as is implied in forbidding laboring men to strive for their own betterment in peaceful and lawful ways; nor must the injunction be used merely to aid some big corporation in carrying out schemes for its own aggrandizement. It must be remembered that a preliminary injunction in a labor case, if granted without adequate proof—even when authority can be found to support the conclusions of law on which it is founded—may often settle the dispute between the parties; and, therefore, if improperly granted may do irreparable wrong. Yet there are many judges who assume a matter-of-course granting of a preliminary injunction to be the ordinary and proper judicial disposition of such cases; and there have undoubtedly been flagrant wrongs committed by judges in connection with labor disputes even within the last few years, although I think much less often than in former years. Such judges by their unwise action immensely strengthen the hands of those who are striving entirely to do away with the power of injunction, and therefore such careless use of the injunctive process tends to threaten its very existence, for if the American people ever become convinced that this process is habitually abused, whether in matters affecting labor or in matters affecting corporations, it will be well-nigh impossible to prevent its abolition.

Again, on December 3, 1907, he said:

> Instances of abuse in the granting of injunctions in labor disputes continue to occur, and the resentment in the minds of those who feel that their rights are being invaded and their liberty of action and of speech unwarrantably restrained continues likewise to grow. Much of the attack on the use of the process of injunction is wholly without warrant; but I am constrained to express the belief that for some of it there is warrant. This question is becoming more and more one of prime importance, and unless the courts will themselves deal with it in an effective manner, it is certain ultimately to demand some form of legislative action. It would be most unfortunate for our social welfare if we should permit many honest and law-abiding citizens to feel that they had just cause for regarding our courts with hostility. I earnestly commend to the attention of the Congress this matter, so that some way may be devised which will limit the abuse of injunctions and protect those whose rights from time to time it unwarrantably invades.

On January 31, 1908, he again declared:

> It is all wrong to use the injunction to prevent the entirely proper and legitimate actions of labor organizations in their struggle for industrial betterment, or under the guise of protecting property rights unwarrantably to invade the fundamental rights of the individual. It is futile to concede, as we all do, the right and the necessity of organized effort on the part of the wage earners, and yet by injunctive process to forbid peaceable action to accomplish the lawful objects for which they are organized and upon which their success depends.

While the recommendations made from time to time vary somewhat in detail, I presume no one will dispute that they establish, so far as the word of a President of the United States can establish it, the existence of a well-grounded complaint and the necessity for remedial legislation. It is late now to be told that the whole thing is baseless agitation.

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON], says that before the committee which had this bill under consideration there appeared not one man who put his finger upon any specific instance of abuse, and that in all the years in which he has sat as a member of that committee, no such abuse has been called to his attention. I would not in the least impugn either the integrity, intelligence, or industry of the gentleman; but if no such abuse has been called to his attention by others, the books of the law are wide open to him, and in their pages he could have read case after case that would have given him the light he sought. [Applause.] In a matter such as this, I agree that it will not do to content ourselves with general criticisms. We will not better the situation by mere declamation or denunciation; nor must we lose ourselves in the pursuit of academic theories. The thing to do is to go to the cases in which the courts have acted, and where their practice and procedure have failed to meet the standard, put our finger on the specific error and so far as we can, prevent its repetition.

The general principles which should govern courts in the issuance of injunctions have been often stated, but never better so than by Mr. Justice Baldwin, in Bonaparte v. Railroad Co. (217 Fed. Cas., 1617), when he said:

> There is no power, the exercise of which is more delicate, which requires greater caution, deliberation, and sound discretion or is more dangerous in a doubtful case, than the issuing of an injunction. It is the strong arm of equity, that never ought to be extended, unless in cases of great injury, where courts of law can not afford an adequate or commensurate remedy in damages. The right must be clear, the injury impending or threatened, so as to be averted only by the protective preventive process of injunction; but that will not be awarded in doubtful cases, or new ones not coming within well established principles, for if it issues erroneously an irreparable injury is inflicted, for which there can be no redress, it being the act of a court, not of the party who prays for it. It will be refused till the court are satisfied that the case before them is of a right about to be destroyed, irreparably injured, or great or lasting injury about to be done by an illegal act. In such a case the court owes it to its own suitors and its own principles to administer the only remedy the law allows to prevent the commission of the act.

With the writ of injunction as so applied and administered there can be and ought to be no complaint. The adjective "beneficent," which has been so often applied to it, is well deserved, for in law as elsewhere, an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure; and just in proportion as the value and importance of the writ should be recognized so should its efficiency be safeguarded and its misuse be prevented. I accept the challenge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON], and assert that if the testimony of the witnesses before the committee did not disclose them, still the reported cases will show at least five glaring abuses which have crept into the administration of this remedy. I name them:

The issuance of injunctions without notice.
The issuance of injunctions without bond.
The issuance of injunctions without detail.
The issuance of injunctions without parties.
And in trades disputes particularly, the issuance of injunctions against certain well-established and indisputable rights.

These are the evils which this bill seeks to cure.

NOTICE.

Section 263, being the first section of the pending bill, is directed against the issuance of injunctions and restraining orders without notice. Both the majority and the minority of the committee agree with the President, and with the President's predecessor, that this is a practice which should be corrected. All realize alike that when an injunction is issued without notice it virtually deprives the defendant in many cases of his constitutional right to a day in court. The mere issuance of an injunction often achieves the purpose of the suit, and, if continued in force for but a short time, accomplishes all which the plaintiff could have hoped, and effectually destroys the defendant. When such an injunction has fallen, like a bolt from a clear sky, upon the unhappy litigant, punishing him beyond recovery before a hearing can be had, it is no wonder that he feels himself the victim of a rank injustice and that his sense of wrong sometimes blazes into fierce criticism of the courts and deep resentment against all forms of law.

In the earliest Federal legislation on this subject, the judiciary act of March 2, 1793, the necessity for notice upon the issuance of an injunction was recognized. Section 5 of that act was in the following language:

> That writs of ne exeat and of injunction may be granted by any judge of the Supreme Court in cases where they might be granted by the supreme or a circuit court; but no writ of ne exeat shall be granted unless a suit in equity be commenced, and satisfactory proof shall be made to the court or judge granting the same that the defendant designs quickly to depart from the United States; nor shall a writ of injunction be granted to stay proceedings in any court of a State; nor shall such writ be granted in any case without reasonable previous notice to the adverse party or his attorney of the time and place of moving for the same.

So the law remained in substance until the act of June 1, 1872 (17 U. S. Stat., 197), cast it into its present form, as follows:

> That whenever notice is given of a motion for an injunction out of a circuit or district court of the United States, the court or judge thereof may, if there appears to be danger of irreparable injury from delay, grant an order restraining the act sought to be enjoined until the decision upon the motion. Such order may be granted with or without security, in the discretion of the court or judge: Provided, That no justice of the Supreme Court shall hear or allow any application for an injunction or restraining order except within the circuit to which he is allotted, and in causes pending in the circuit to which he is allotted, or in such causes pending outside of the circuit as the parties may in writing stipulate, except in causes where such application can not be heard by the circuit judge of the circuit or the district judge of the district.

An examination will show that, notwithstanding these statutes, the courts in many cases have actually issued temporary injunctions without notice; and in still other cases, although ostensibly complying with the statute, they have issued so-called restraining orders having all the scope and effect of the injunction order itself, and have set down the motion for the injunction to be heard 60 days, 90 days, or even longer, after the issuance of the so-called restraining order. Thus by a mere matter of the use of names they have kept the word of promise to the ear but broken it to the hope, and nullified the entire purpose of the existing law.

I shall not stop to consider the criticisms which are offered upon the accuracy of the résumé of preexisting law contained in the report of the majority; all that is entirely aside from this discussion. All agree upon the evil, and all alike are seeking for some method to remedy it. There are certain minor differences, however, between the first section of the pending bill and the substitute introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON] and offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], but only two points of variance justify consideration. If the substitute offered by the minority should be adopted in its present form, it will, by necessary implication, repeal section 266 of the present Judicial Code, which relates to the issuance of injunctions suspending the enforcement of any statute of a State, and which provides a special procedure adapted to such cases. This section is preserved intact in the bill presented by the committee. The other material difference pointed out with entire candor by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON], and as to which there is room for legitimate difference of opinion, is that with reference to the duration of a temporary restraining order which may have been issued in a case of emergency without prior notice. The bill provides that such a temporary restraining order must be forthwith entered of record. It can not be carried in the pocket of the litigant until, in his judgment, an opportune time has come to spring the trap which he has set for his adversary. The moment the signature of the court is affixed it must be presented to the clerk and made a matter of public record. Within 7 days thereafter of its own force and effect it terminates, unless, in case of peculiar hardship, the applicant may be able to show to the court good cause for an additional 7 days' extension, or 14 days in all; and if he applies for an additional 7 days, notice of such application must be given to those who have been previously served with the original order. This provision, as the gentleman concedes, complies literally with the message of the President under date of December 7, 1909, as also with the messages of his predecessor under date of March 25, 1908, and December 8, 1908; all of which recommend that the temporary restraining order should terminate within a fixed number of days after its date of issuance. But the substitute provides that instead of terminating within seven days from the date of issuance it shall terminate within seven days from the date of service, and this because it is suggested that it might be difficult, if not impossible, to have service upon the defendant within the original seven days and that he would not be bound by the order until such service had been had. What is the practical effect of such a modification? Suppose instead of 1 defendant there are 20.

The substitute measure does not provide that the order of injunction shall be immediately entered of record; the plaintiff may retain it, as I say, until, in his judgment, an opportune moment has come to spring his trap. Then in his own good time notice is served upon defendant A; some days later, notice is served upon defendant B; later still upon defendant C, and so on in succession upon each. As to each defendant the order is supposed to expire within seven days after its service, and service having been had on defendants on successive days, the temporary restraining order expires like a string of firecrackers exploding as to the defendants, one at a time, in the order of service upon them. This is the inevitable result of the substitute offered by the minority. Of course, inconveniences arising from the necessity for service of process are inseparable from all litigation. A man who can not secure jurisdiction of his adversary by service of process, whether it be summons, subpœna, temporary restraining order, or what not, will be unable to bring him within reach of the power of the court; but, if as suggested, the defendant is deliberately endeavoring to evade service of process in order to escape the effect of the temporary restraining order, it must certainly follow that in so doing he has removed himself from the sphere of immediate mischief and that immediate and irreparable injury from his action is no longer likely to ensue to the plaintiff. In evading the process of the court, he puts it out of his power to commit the injury.

SECURITY.

Section 266a of the bill provides that no restraining order or interlocutory order of injunction shall issue except upon the giving of security conditioned upon the payment of such costs and damages as may be suffered by any party wrongfully enjoined. It is certainly not unfair that he who seeks the extraordinary relief of the writ of injunction should indemnify his adversary, if it proves that he has secured it without right; for it is well settled that in the absence of an express undertaking to that effect, a plaintiff who has wrongfully secured a writ of injunction is liable to the defendant for nothing more than the costs of the suit, and this for the reason that while the injunction is issued at the application of the plaintiff, it is nevertheless in law the act of the court and not of the party seeking it. The only surprising thing is that to this time there has been no Federal statute on this subject. The only statutory reference to the subject of security upon the issuing of injunctions is contained in the act of 1873, and now appearing as section 263 of the Judicial Code, which permits restraining orders to be issued with or without security, as the court may determine. As long ago as 1723 it was enacted in the then Colony of Maryland that bond should be required in all cases where an injunction was issued to restrain an action at law. This example was followed in the State of Virginia in 1787, in New Jersey in 1799, in New York in 1828, and in 1848 the statutes of the State of New York extended this requirement to all injunctions. In many others, if not in all the States, this example has been followed.

The only objection or criticism now offered to this section of the present bill is that it is utterly unnecessary and conveys an implied reflection upon the courts, since the courts have unanimously met its requirements. Foster on Federal Practice, a standard work, has been quoted by the gentleman with approval, in which I join. I cite it now as an authority to support this particular section and to show that certain of the Federal courts have not met this requirement, but have committed this particular violation of good practice. I read from First Foster's Federal Practice, page 753:

Later the practice (i. e., the practice as to security) "was extended to interlocutory injunctions granted upon notice to the defendant, first in special cases, then generally; and now they" (i. e., bonds) are usually required as a matter of course in England and in most of the United States, although in some of the circuits the Federal judges are accustomed to grant injunctions without such a requirement.

It is to correct that practice in some of the circuits—a practice which I think the gentleman joins us in condemning—that this provision of the bill is inserted.

FORM OF ORDER AND PARTIES.

The next clause of the bill, section 266b, has reference to the form and contents of the order. The complaint has been that the Federal courts have issued writs of injunction without detail and directed them to persons not properly before them. It is asserted again that there are no precedents which justify the enactment of this section; that the Federal courts have always in their injunction orders described the acts forbidden to be done with sufficient detail; and that it wholly ignores the rules of equity of the Supreme Court of the United States, which are alleged to prescribe with great minuteness the form and contents of the injunctive orders and are in conflict with the provisions of the bill. I challenge the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON], as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] challenged him, to point to one word, letter, or syllable in the rules of equity prescribed by the Supreme Court of the United States, 94 in number, which either cover the scope of this section of the bill or are in conflict with it. It can not be that reference is made to rule 21, which provides that where an injunction is desired there must be a special prayer to that effect; nor rule 23, which renders it unnecessary to repeat the prayer for an injunction as a part of the prayer for process; nor rule 55, which in substance repeats the requirements of the statute as to notice on the issuance of injunctions; nor rule 93, which provides for the extension of an injunction order pending an appeal; nor rule 86, which simply declares that it shall no longer be necessary to set out in extenso either the bill or any other pleadings in any order entered by the court. Except this last rule, with the salutary provision which it contains and with which this bill in no sense conflicts, I assert that there is not within the equity rules one single sentence governing or controlling the contents of a writ of injunction.

As to the other stock objection, that the section seeks to correct an abuse which does not exist, I turn again, without stopping to quote other available authorities, to the first volume of Foster's Federal Practice, page 745, and read what will, I think, amply sustain the contention of the majority in this matter:

The writ should contain a concise description of the particular acts or things in respect to which the defendant is enjoined; and should conform to the directions of the order granting the injunction. * * * The defendants ought to be informed, as accurately as the case permits, what they are forbidden to do. It seems that a writ is insufficient which designates the acts sought to be enjoined by a reference to the bill without describing them. When a carrier has been adjudged to have violated the interstate commerce law, the court should only enjoin certain specific violations. An injunction should not be granted—

As a Federal court had done—

commanding the carrier in general terms not to violate the act in the future in any particular. The injunction should not include a direction—

As a Federal court had included—

after specific inhibitions forbidding the defendant to act by any other method or device, the purpose and effect of which is to restrain commerce as aforesaid.

I call upon the personal knowledge and information of every lawyer on this floor to verify the statement that a practice has been indulged in of including in these writs of injunction at the end of a specific and detailed statement of the acts sought to be enjoined, an omnibus or basket clause forbidding all other acts of similar character or referring for further details to the prayer of the bill, in the hope that anything which might have been omitted by the overzealous lawyer would be inserted or corrected by the courts when the time for the punishment of the defendant had arrived. If such an evil exists, and that it does the text which I have read demonstrates, this bill will correct it.

But for the second clause of this section—226b of the bill—the mildest adjective which has been found is that it is "sinister." As one reads it, it seems harmless enough. It says of the writ of injunction or restraining order that—it shall be binding only on the parties to the suit, their agents, servants, employees, and attorneys or those in active concert with them, and who shall by personal service or otherwise have received actual notice of the same.

I insist, Mr. Speaker, that that language is an exact and accurate declaration of the law, both as it is and as it ought to be. And I further insist that this well-established law has been so ignored as to warrant legislative action. That the courts can act only upon persons who are parties to the suit is certainly a rule which ought to be agreed to as soon as stated. It springs from the basic and fundamental distinction between the judicial and the legislative branches of the Government, which consists primarily in this, that when the legislature acts its mandate, without direct notice or notice of any sort, is binding upon all the community alike. It speaks with a trumpet tone which all must hear and issues a command which all must revere and respect. The judicial branch of the Government, on the other hand, speaks only to those who are before it as parties to the litigation and to whose personal attention the order of the court must in some way be brought; and it has no more right to issue a command directed against the community at large than has the Czar of Russia to promulgate a ukase on American soil. Any violation of this rule is a flagrant transgression of the limit of judicial power.

The principle finds recognition in equity rule 48, prescribed by the Supreme Court of the United States, which is as follows:

Where the parties on either side are very numerous and can not without manifest inconvenience and oppressive delays in the suit be all brought before it, the court, in its discretion, may dispense with making all of them parties and may proceed in the suit, having sufficient parties before it to represent all the adverse interests of the plaintiffs and the defendants in the suit properly before it. But in such cases the decree shall be without prejudice to the rights and claims of all the absent parties.

It will be said again that no illustrations have been given of the violation of this principle. I think they can be furnished. If the gentleman will turn, for instance, to the case of Chisolm v. Caines (121 Fed., 397), he will find a writ of injunction issued by a Federal court in the State of South Carolina, presided over by a judge who has since gone to a well-deserved reward. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. You are aware as to where he has gone?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. It is fair to say that this case is not typical of his judicial actions. Certain gentlemen had leased lands and marshes on the waters of Winyah Bay, in South Carolina, for a hunting and shooting preserve. A controversy arose over the title. An injunction was issued against the contesting claimants and their confederates enjoining them from entering upon the premises and frightening away the game. This injunction pretended to enjoin not only the defendants to the suit, but "all persons whomsoever." Copies of it were posted on the premises, and certain persons, one of whom happened to be a lawyer himself and a trial justice, but in no way associated with the defendants and not even charged to have been in confederacy with them, entered upon the sacred inclosures and shot some of the ducks which were hibernating there. They were punished for contempt of this injunction, although the court frankly stated that there was no charge whatever that they had combined or confederated with the defendants or were in any sense their agents or attorneys. Under any proper construction of the law the injunction was to them as nugatory as if printed in Italian and published in China.

Now, another case. In the case of Scott v. Donald (165 U. S., 107) a writ of injunction was applied for before the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina in a suit having as its objective point the South Carolina dispensary law. It is interesting to notice that it was granted at the instance of James Donald, who purported to sue in his own behalf and on behalf of all other persons in the State of South Carolina as importers for their own use and consumers of wines, ales, and spirituous liquors, the products of other States and foreign countries. I do not know how many citizens of South Carolina were embraced within that description. [Laughter.]

The defendants, however, were certain parties named who were seeking to enforce the law and "all other persons claiming to act as constables, and all sheriffs, policemen, and other officers acting or claiming to act under the South Carolina dispensary law." When that injunction was presented to the Supreme Court of the United States it very properly laid down the rule of law contained in this bill. I read from the opinion of the court:

The decree is also objectionable because it enjoins persons not parties to the suit. This is not a case where the defendants named represent those not named. Nor is there alleged any conspiracy between the parties defendant and other unknown parties. The acts complained of are tortious and do not grow out of any common action or agreement between constables and sheriffs of the State of South Carolina. We have, indeed, a right to presume that such officers, though not named in this suit, will, when advised that certain provisions of the act in question have been pronounced unconstitutional by the courts to which the Constitution of the United States refers such questions, voluntarily refrain from enforcing such provisions; but we do not think it comports with well-settled principles of equity procedure to include them in an injunction in a suit in which they were not heard or represented or to subject them to penalties for contempt in disregarding such an injunction. (Fellows v. Fellows, 4 John Chan., 25, citing Iveson v. Harris, 7 Ves., 257.)

The decree of the court below should therefore be amended by being restricted to the parties named as plaintiff and defendants in the bill, and this is directed to be done, and it is otherwise affirmed.

As an argument against this bill it has been urged that it would have prevented the issuance of the injunction in the famous Debs case. The merest scrutiny of the bill will show that this is not true. The Debs case, which was a suit brought by the United States in its own name to prevent obstruction of the mails and interference with interstate commerce occupied an entirely different field and was in no sense a suit involving the relation of employer and employee; and if the right to an injunction in that particular case is to be affected by legislation, it must be reached by some other method than that adopted in this bill. But I frankly concede that if this bill had been then in force one phrase in the Debs injunction would not have been used, and at least one instance of judicial usurpation would have been prevented. The order in that case was directed against certain defendants, who were named, and others combining and conspiring with them, and then against "all other persons whomsoever." In the use of this last phrase I maintain that the court spoke beyond the limits of its power. As to this a learned writer has said:

It is difficult to see how such injunctions can stand the test of precedent and principle. An injunction issues in a civil suit to any party who has been complained of, at least, and has had notice of the motion of his adversary. To be obliged to wait until the injunction has been violated to determine against whom it was issued ought to be enough to show that it is not an injunction at all, but in the nature of a police proclamation putting the community in general in peril of contempt if the proclamation be disobeyed. Courts of equity were evidently not intended to possess such functions, and it must be regretted that Judge Grosscup, in his most commendable eagerness to offset the criminal inaction of Gov. Altgeld, should have been forced to such a legal anomaly. The power of a court to imprison for contempt of its orders or of the persons of its judges is an arbitrary one at best, and to stretch it as here in the time of disorders and almost panic in the immediate vicinity would seem to show that the court has been deserted by the calm judicial temper which should always characterize its proceedings. (8 Harvard Law Review, p. 228.)

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Is that the opinion of a court?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. It is not. It is an extract from the remarks of a learned commentator with reference to that particular proceeding, and I may say that the Supreme Court of the United States in no part of its decision in that case countenances the part of the order which I have just condemned. It was not brought in issue, for the reason that the party who finally appeared before the Supreme Court was a party named in the injunction and one as to whom this particular question could not arise.

TRADE DISPUTES.

The fourth clause of this bill, section 266c, is divided into two paragraphs. The first provides that in a trades dispute no injunction shall issue unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to the property or property right of the party making the application, for which there is no adequate remedy at law; and that this property or property right must be described with particularity and the application must be verified. We are told as to this paragraph that it is infected with the incurable vice of being simply a reenactment of existing law, and yet but a few moments ago we were assured that the chief virtue of the Sterling substitute, or the so-called Moon bill, is that it is merely a reenactment and declaration of existing law or practice. The same characteristic, in other words, is a virtue in the substitute, but a vice in the pending bill. I submit that the same rule should be applied to both. This paragraph is criticized because it provides that the writ of injunction in labor disputes shall be limited to the protection of property and property rights. I am willing that the language of the bill shall be tested by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and that by the decisions of that great court this bill may be justified or by the same decisions it may be condemned. What does that court say in the Debs case itself on this question of jurisdiction in the issuance of injunctions? A quotation of its language will show that it is perfectly true that the first clause of the fourth section of this bill is simply a declaration of an existing rule of law which the Supreme Court has announced.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I have said I would not yield, but I will.

Mr. STERLING. The gentleman is about to refer to the Debs case?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I am, for a quotation only.

Mr. STERLING. No person was punished in the Debs case who did not have actual notice of the injunction.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. That is perfectly true, I think; but I do not understand that the gentleman by that question means to justify the portion of the Debs order which was directed to the world at large.

Mr. STERLING. Not at all; and the gentleman can not say from reading the opinion that the courts would have punished any person for contempt who did not have actual notice.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. It may be that the Supreme Court of the United States would not; indeed, I do not believe it would have justified such a punishment. I have heretofore cited the Debs case, however, as an illustration of the fact that the inferior courts in issuing the writ of injunction have at times transcended their power and should be curbed. [Applause.]

Mr. STERLING. I agree with the gentleman that that part of the order should not have been in the decree, but the gentleman does not pretend to criticize the court in punishing some one who was either not a party or who did not have actual notice?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Of course, I am not retrying the Debs case; I am discussing House bill 23635 and the subjects to which it refers, and I say the first paragraph of the fourth section of this bill does announce existing law; it is not aimed at the destruction of civil rights; it does not tear down the pillars of the temple; it simply announces a rule of law bearing no less sanction than the Supreme Court of the United States. I read from the decision in the Debs case:

Something more than the threatened commission of an offense against the laws of the land is necessary to call into exercise the injunctive power of the court. There must be some interference, actual or threatened, with property or rights of a pecuniary nature, but when such interferences appear, the jurisdiction of a court of equity arises and is not destroyed by the fact that they are accompanied by or are themselves a violation of the criminal law.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I regret it, but I can not yield further.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Before I leave that particular topic, I find further sanction for the language of this bill in a bill introduced by no less person than the ranking member of the minority of the Judiciary Committee himself. The bill introduced by the ranking member of the minority of the Judiciary Committee, Mr. STERLING, on the 9th day of March, 1912, with reference to the issuance of injunctions and temporary restraining orders contains the language:

Provided, however, That if it shall be made to appear to the court or judge that delay will result in irreparable injury to property or property right, the court shall so certify on the back of the application, and in such case the injunction or restraining order may issue without notice.

And I think he will agree that the quotation I have read from the decision in the Debs case is a correct statement as to the limitation of the equitable power of injunction.

The second paragraph of section 266c of the bill is an effort to crystallize into law the best opinions of the best courts as to those things which may be lawfully done in a trades dispute without interference by injunction. This is criticized by the minority as a proposal without precedent in legislative history, but at the same time the minority say in their report upon the bill that:

Most of the acts thus recited are in themselves not amenable to the injunction process under existing law and practice. No court does or would enjoin them.

Perhaps the most careful and impartial study which has been made of the question of trades disputes in recent years is the Treatise on the Modern Law of Labor Unions, by W. A. Martin, published in the year 1910. As against those who deny that organized labor has any just grievance in this matter, I quote the language of this learned writer in his preface, in which he says:

There is, however, a great lack of harmony in the decisions relating to trade disputes, and many of them, it is believed, are erroneous in principle and oppressive and unjust to organized labor. In this category may be placed decisions which hold without qualification that strikes or threats of strikes to procure the discharge or prevent the employment of workmen are unlawful and criminal, as being unwarrantable interference with the business of the employer, and an invasion of the rights of the workmen against whom these acts are directed; denying unions the right to exercise disciplinary measures in accordance with their rules and by-laws, to compel insubordinate members to join in a lawful strike or continue on strike after going out; holding that all picketing is unlawful; enjoining unions at the instance of an employer against whom a strike is in operation from giving strike pay or using its funds in furtherance of picketing; requiring defendants against whom a writ of injunction, defective and ambiguous in its terms, has been awarded, to ascertain—or, more properly speaking, to attempt to ascertain—what is prohibited by reading the writ in connection with the bill.

If either statement be true, is it not an act of simple justice to say so? An uncertain standard for civil conduct or legal remedy is a constant invitation to misunderstanding and discord. When capital and labor clearly understand each other's rights, the first step on the road to industrial peace will have been taken. This bill is intended to promote that understanding. With the laboring men the country over demanding this reform; with Presidents and platforms, law writers, and even judges agreeing that it is necessary, why should any man be unwilling to grant this relief?

What reason is there for refusing to recognize the right of the employer to discharge his workman and the right of the workman to leave the service of his employer? These rights are above and beyond control by any process of injunction. Would any employer tamely submit to a court order which compelled him to retain in his service a man whose labor was no longer useful to him? Can any man be compelled to labor against his will? If the employer breaks a contract by discharging his employee, or if the employee breaks a contract by leaving his employer, the remedy is an action for damages. The process of injunction does not fit the case.

THE RIGHT TO STRIKE.

The right to strike has won its way against the judicial opposition of a hundred years. In the earliest reported case in England, that of Rex v. Journeymen Tailors of Cambridge (8 Modern, 10) it was held that a combination to raise wages by quitting work simultaneously was a criminal conspiracy and indictable accordingly. It took an act of Parliament to wipe this pernicious doctrine out of the English law. Many of the States in this country, notably Alabama, Connecticut, Colorado, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Montana, New Hampshire, New York, North Dakota, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Texas, West Virginia, and Mississippi, have forbidden by express statute the use of force, violence, or intimidation in trades disputes, but the right to strike and to persuade others by peaceful means to join in doing so is now too well established for argument. Of course, if that be true, gentlemen will say again, Why legislate about it? The answer is found in such orders as were issued by Judge Jenkins in Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Northern Pacific Railroad Co. (60 Fed., 803), which Judge Harlan, sitting in the circuit court of appeals, very properly rebuked in the case of Arthur v. Oakes (63 Fed., 310). His language is worth repetition. He said:

> If an employee quits without cause, and in violation of an express contract to serve for a stated time, then his quitting would not be of right, and he would be liable for any damages resulting from a breach of his agreement, and perhaps, in some states of case, to criminal prosecution for loss of life or limb by passengers or others, directly resulting from his abandoning his post at a time when care and watchfulness were required upon his part in the discharge of a duty he had undertaken to perform. And it may be assumed for the purposes of this discussion that he would be liable in like manner where the contract of service, by necessary implication arising out of the nature or the circumstances of the employment, required him not to quit the service of his employer suddenly, and without reasonable notice of his intention to do so. But the vital question remains whether a court of equity will, under any circumstances, by injunction, prevent one individual from quitting the personal service of another? An affirmative answer to this question is not, we think, justified by any authority to which our attention has been called or of which we are aware. It would be an invasion of one's natural liberty to compel him to work for or to remain in the personal service of another. One who is placed under such constraint is in a condition of involuntary servitude—a condition which the supreme law of the land declares shall not exist within the United States, or in any place subject to their jurisdiction. Courts of equity have sometimes sought to sustain a contract for services requiring special knowledge or skill by enjoining acts or conduct that would constitute a breach of such contract.
> The rule, we think, is without exception that equity will not compel the actual, affirmative performance by an employee of merely personal services, any more than it will compel an employer to retain in his personal service one who, no matter for what cause, is not acceptable to him for service of that character. The right of an employee engaged to perform personal service to quit that service rests upon the same basis as the right of his employer to discharge him from further personal service. If the quitting in the one case or the discharging in the other is in violation of the contract between the parties, the one injured by the breach has his action for damages; and a court of equity will not, indirectly or negatively, by means of an injunction restraining the violation of the contract, compel the affirmative performance from day to day or the affirmative acceptance of merely personal services. Relief of that character has always been regarded as impracticable.

If newspaper reports are correct, within the last 12 months a similar injunction was issued from a court in the city of Des Moines, Iowa, and was heralded as a new and valuable discovery in the settlement of labor disputes. Can it be said that men whose rights are so infringed upon have no grievance?

THE RIGHT TO PICKET.

Or take again the question of the right to picket. The language of the bill with reference to "picketing" is borrowed from the English trades dispute act of 1906, and prohibits an injunction against—> attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be for the purpose of peaceably obtaining or communicating information, or of peaceably persuading any person to work or abstain from working.

So well does this express the current of American judicial opinion on this subject that in Martin's Modern Law of Labor Unions, to which I have referred, it is said:

> This statute might well be termed a codification of the law relating to peaceful picketing as laid down by a majority of the American courts.

To emphasize this statement, I ask your indulgence while I read two quotations of some length from Federal decisions. In the case of Pope Motor Car Co. v. Keegan et al (150 Fed., 148), the court uses this language:

> To interfere by violence, by threats, or by intimidation, with others who are pursuing their natural and constitutional right to labor when and where they please, is always wrong and always unlawful. No sense of personal wrong, however great, however natural, or however excusable, can justify such interference. No offended sense of right, as, for instance, that another is unjustly "taking his job," gives warrant to such interference. The strikers themselves are entitled to no more rights than those whom they find working in their old places. Individual freedom is the chief of the rights of justice. It can not be said that a job is held except by mutual consent. It can not be claimed by any intelligent man that one holds his job whether his employer desires it or not. As well might we say that the workman, against his will, can be held to service by his employer.
> But nothing can be better settled, either in law, in conscience, or in common sense, than that every man may seek or refuse work wheresoever he will; that workmen may combine for their mutual advantage; that they may persuade fellow workmen, or others, to leave their employment; but such persuasion must be such as to persuade by reason, and not compel by threat or violence, or intimidation. One of the forms of persuasion which, under proper circumstances, the law recognizes as permissible, is "picketing" by strikers; that is to say, the detachment of men to suitable places for the purpose of coming into personal relations with the new workmen, in order, if possible, to induce them, by means of peaceful argument, to leave the places which they have taken, for such natural and proper reasons as may appeal to men in such circumstances.

And again in Iron Molders' Union v. Allis-Chalmers Co. (166 Fed., 50), the rights of the parties to a trades dispute are summed up as follows:

> The right of the one to persuade (but not coerce) the unemployed to accept certain terms is limited and conditioned by the right of the other to dissuade (but not restrain) them from accepting. For another thing that must not be forgotten is that a strike is one manifestation of the competition, the struggle for survival or place, that is inevitable in individualistic society. Dividends and wages must both come from the joint product of capital and labor. And in the struggle wherein each is seeking to hold or enlarge his ground, we believe it is fundamental that one and the same set of rules should govern the action of both contestants. For instance, employers may lock out (or threaten to lock out) employees at will, with the idea that idleness will force them to accept lower wages or more onerous conditions; and employees at will may strike (or threaten to strike), with the idea that idleness of the capital involved will force employers to grant better terms. These rights (or legitimate means of contest) are mutual and are fairly balanced against each other. Again, an employer of molders, having locked out his men, in order to effectuate the purpose of his lockout, may persuade (but not coerce) other foundrymen not to employ molders for higher wages or on better terms than those for which he made his stand, and not to take in his late employees at all, so that they may be forced back to his foundry at his own terms; and molders, having struck, in order to make their strike effective may persuade (but not coerce) other molders not to work for less wages or under worse conditions than those for which they struck, and not to work for their late employer at all, so that he may be forced to take them back into his foundry at their own terms. Here, also, the rights are mutual and fairly balanced. On the other hand, an employer, having locked out his men, will not be permitted, though it would reduce their fighting strength, to coerce their landlords and grocers into cutting off shelter and food; and employees, having struck, will not be permitted, though it might subdue their late employer, to coerce dealers and users into starving his business. The restraints, likewise, apply to both combatants and are fairly balanced. These illustrations, we believe, mark out the line that must be observed by both. In contests between capital and labor the only means of injuring each other that are lawful are those that operate directly and immediately upon the control and supply of work to be done and of labor to do it, and thus directly affect the apportionment of the common fund, for only at this point exists the competition, the evils of which organized society will endure rather than suppress the freedom and initiative of the individual. But attempts to injure each other by coercing members of society who are not directly concerned in the pending controversy to make raids in the rear can not be tolerated by organized society, for the direct, the primary, attack is upon society itself. And for the enforcement of these mutual rights and restraints organized society offers to both parties, equally, all the instrumentalities of law and of equity.
> With respect to picketing as well as persuasion, we think the decree went beyond the line. The right to persuade new men to quit or decline employment is of little worth unless the strikers may ascertain who are the men that their late employer has persuaded or is attempting to persuade to accept employment. Under the name of persuasion, duress may be used; but it is duress, not persuasion, that should be restrained and punished. In the guise of picketing, strikers may obstruct and annoy the new men, and by insult and menacing attitude intimidate them as effectually as by physical assault. But from the evidence it can always be determined whether the efforts of the pickets are limited to getting into communication with the new men for the purpose of presenting arguments and appeals to their free judgments. Prohibitions of persuasion and picketing, as such, should not be included in the decree. Karges Furniture Co. v. Amalgamated Wood Workers' Union (165 Ind., 421; 75 N. E., 877; 2 L. R. A. (N. S.), 788); Everett-Waddy Co. v. Typographical Union (105 Va., 188; 53 S. E., 273; 5 L. R. A. (N. S.), 792).

But compare with these words such expressions as the intemperate language of a Federal judge in the case of Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. v. Gee (139 Fed., 584), who said:

There is and can be no such thing as peaceful picketing any more than there can be chaste vulgarity or peaceful mobbing or lawful lynching.

THE SECONDARY BOYCOTT.

Gentlemen say that the effect of this bill is to legalize the so-called "secondary boycott." I deny it. In the first place, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] has said, the word "legalize" is misused. The bill does not pretend to be a code governing the conduct of trades disputes. All that is attempted here is to say that certain acts are not amenable to the process of injunction, whatever other rights or remedies may grow out of them; but within the acts enumerated by this bill, the secondary boycott is certainly not included.

It is not surprising, however, that gentlemen should fall into error on this subject when the courts themselves have not been always clear. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the late case of Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co., calls attention to this conflict among the courts, and says:

The courts differ as to what constitutes a boycott that may be enjoined. All hold that there must be a conspiracy causing irreparable damage to the business or property of the complainant. Some hold that a boycott against the complainant by a combination of persons not immediately connected with him in business can be restrained; others hold that the secondary boycott can be enjoined where the conspiracy extends not only to injuring the complainant, but secondarily coerces or attempts to coerce his customers from dealing with him by threats that unless they do they themselves will be boycotted. Others hold that no boycott can be enjoined unless there are acts of physical violence or intimidation caused by threats of physical violence.

What is the secondary boycott? It can be summed up in a sentence as coercion in some form directed against a person who is not a party to the trades dispute, in order to force him to join in injuring one of the parties to the dispute. It is a clear invasion of the rights of neutrals. The law recognizes the fact that a man may employ whomever he chooses and may be employed as long as he will. When the relation of employer and employee ends, either may withdraw patronage or favor from the other; either may announce to his friends that he has so withdrawn; but neither can say to friend or foe that at the risk of personal injury they must, though unwilling, join in the conflict.

The language of this bill is:

from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do.

Does anything less than this protect the fundamental and constitutional rights of the parties concerned? I repeat that the essence of the secondary boycott is coercion directed toward a person not a party to the dispute. This bill does not countenance coercion toward anyone, and least of all toward third parties. I ask leave for another quotation from Martin's Modern Law of Labor Unions, pages 107 to 109, to which I have referred, in support of this position:

It is lawful for members of a union acting by agreement among themselves to cease to patronize a person against whom the concert of action is directed, when they regard it for their interest to do so. This is the so-called "primary boycott," and in furtherance thereof it is lawful to circulate notices among the members of the union to cease patronizing one with whom they have a trade dispute, and to announce their intention to carry their agreement into effect. For instance, if an employer of labor refuses to employ union men, the union has a right to say that its members will not patronize him. * * *

In a preceding chapter it has been shown that in aid of a lawful strike, it is lawful to use peaceable persuasion and argument to induce other workmen in the employ of the person against whom the strike has been declared, and not bound by contract for a definite term, to quit his service or to induce other workmen not in his employ not to enter his service. There is practically no dissent from this doctrine, and by parity of reasoning it is not unlawful for members of a union or their sympathizers to use, in aid of a justifiable strike, peaceable argument and persuasion to induce customers of the person against whom the strike is in operation to withhold their patronage from him, although their purpose in so doing is to injure the business of their former employer and constrain him to yield to their demands; and the same rule applies where the employer has locked out his employees. These acts may be consummated by direct communication or through the medium of the press, and it is only when the combination becomes a conspiracy to injure by threats and coercion the proper rights of another that the power of the courts can be invoked. The vital distinction between combinations of this character and boycotts is that here no coercion is present, while, as was heretofore shown, coercion is a necessary element of a boycott.

REQUIREMENT OF PEACEFULNESS.

It will be seen that all throughout the section there runs the requirement of peacefulness. Force, violence, intimidation, fraud, coercion—none of these will any man seek to justify, whether they be used in a trades dispute or elsewhere. They have occurred; no doubt they will occur again; but it is only fair to say that in many cases where they might have been anticipated they have not occurred at all; and I believe it equally fair to say that in many a labor dispute where turmoil, strife, and violence have arisen not the laboring men themselves, but lawless men in no way connected with them have seized the opportunity and the pretext to break the bonds of law and order. Lawless and criminal men have attached themselves to the organizations of workingmen, as they have done to every organized unit of human society since history began. But I for one will never believe that the great body of workingmen of this country—those who in the language of Jesus, the son of Sirach, "maintain the fabric of the world" and without whom "shall not a city be inhabited"—are any less devoted to free institutions, any the less friends of established order, any the more ready to violate the law than those of other occupations or different opportunities. Well might we tremble if it were otherwise.

Look at the English coal strike—happily, just ended. I read only the other day in a dispatch from London that the anarchist leaders are disgusted with what they are pleased to call the tractability of English toilers. Can history parallel their conduct? Nearly 2,000,000 workers out and not a single serious act of violence—nay, not an angry word spoken against the monarchy.

Read the address issued on the 13th of April last by the officers of the Anthracite Mine Workers to their men. It says:

The unanimous response of the anthracite mine workers to the suspension order and the peaceful manner in which they have conducted themselves since they ceased work, April 1, are most gratifying. Every colliery is idle; each and every man composing the great army of mine workers, numbering 170,000, ceased work. They will remain idle until a settlement of the wage scale is reached. The success of a movement of this kind, however, depends largely upon the orderly, law-abiding manner in which each and every man conducts himself.

And then the address goes on to warn the men to—beware of any who counsel to violence in any form—and calls upon them to conduct themselves in a law-abiding manner.

I denounce as a libel upon American citizenship the assertion that the laboring men of this country are ever ready at the word to break into lawlessness or that they sympathize with those who do. And I pity the man who takes such counsel of his fears as to be unwilling to recognize and accord to them by statute and in practice the full use of every legitimate weapon of offense or defense in all trade wars and the untrammeled exercise of every constitutional right. Not to do so is but to furnish to the demagogue and the agitator a genuine grievance to be magnified and a ready means with which to fan the flames of discontent, hatred, disorder, and violence. Let us see to it here and now that no such pretext hereafter shall remain to him.

CLASS LEGISLATION.

It has been suggested by those opposed to section 266c of this bill that it is class legislation. Such an assertion mistakes the meaning of the term. It is not legislation which confers upon the employer or the employee or upon those seeking employment any immunity or privilege which others do not enjoy, nor does it take away from either employer or employee any right which others might exercise. It does not even undertake to codify the rights of employer and employee in trade disputes, a thing which has been done elsewhere and may, soon or late, have to be done here.

It does undertake to regulate to a limited extent the procedure in cases arising from such disputes, but in doing so it simply announces rules common to other cases in equity, and it does declare that certain acts lying within the rights of the parties shall not be infringed upon by any injunction. Had these rules of procedure been uniformly followed, as they should have been; had these rights been uniformly recognized, as they should have been, there would have been little demand for this legislation, and less reason for its enactment; but the mere fact that it relates, in part, to a certain well-recognized class of cases makes it smack no more, perhaps not even so much, of class legislation as a dozen statutes already on the books. What, for instance, of the liability act as to common carriers and their employees, which affects both the rights and the remedies of those who stand in that relation; what of the proposed compensation acts for workmen employed by the Government or by the railroads; what, indeed, of the interstate commerce act itself, which defines the relative rights between the shipper on the one hand and the carrier on the other, and prescribes their remedies? In this sense, what are your factory laws but class legislation for the benefit of mill hands; what your eight-hour day, your children's bureau, and so on down the long list of laws aimed to give relief for specific evils where relief is needed? I repeat that it is no objection to any law that it is intended to right the wrongs of any class, race, or section of society, so only it gives no more than equal and exact justice. Class legislation, in the vicious sense of the word, means special privilege, and special privilege only, and against this the Democratic Party has sworn eternal and unending war. This is both the letter and the spirit of the declaration made in the Democratic platform that—

We believe that the parties to all judicial proceedings should be treated with rigid impartiality, and that injunctions should not be issued in any cases in which injunctions would not issue if no industrial dispute were involved.

And this is the thought which underlies that provision of the bill forbidding an injunction against—any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto.

CONSTITUTIONALITY.

It has been hinted, not argued, that this measure goes beyond the constitutional power of Congress as to the courts. Time does not permit a discussion of this phase of the matter. I must content myself with a mere quotation again from the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of In re Robinson (19 Wall., 505), having reference to the power to punish for contempt:

The power has been limited and defined by the act of Congress, March 2, 1831, and the act in terms applies to all courts; whether it can be held to limit the authority of the Supreme Court, which derives its existence and powers from the Constitution, may perhaps be a matter of doubt, but that it applies to the circuit and district courts there can be no question. These courts were created by act of Congress. Their powers and duties depend upon the act calling them into existence or subsequent acts extending or limiting their jurisdiction. The act of 1831 is therefore to them the law specifying cases in which summary punishment for contempt may be inflicted.

CONCLUSION.

It is easy to be aphoristic on this whole subject. It is less trouble to deny the existence of any evil than to search it out and find means for its correction. It involves little effort to content ourselves with generalities—to declare in favor of the stability of the courts, the preservation of law and order, and the integrity of judicial power as essential to the peace, order, and well-being of civilized society. With such a declaration, no sane man can disagree. The courts of justice are, indeed and in truth, the bulwark of our liberties, and the Democratic platform well declares that—we yield to none in our purpose to maintain their dignity.

On the other hand, there are those who, recognizing the need of reform, are ready to rush headlong after so-called remedies, which when put to the test will only aggravate the disease they are supposed to cure. With those who believe that by applying the doctrine of the recall to judicial officers the courts will be elevated, justice promoted, or free government made secure, I must differ—respectfully I hope—but none the less with all the vigor I can command. Herodotus tells us that King Cambyses, displeased at one of his judges, Sisamnes, for his giving of an unrighteous sentence, slew and flayed him, and cutting his skin into strips, stretched them across the seat of the throne whereon he had been wont to sit when he heard causes. Having so done, Cambyses appointed the son of Sisamnes to be judge in his father's room and bade him never forget in what way his seat was cushioned. This was the recall with a vengeance. But how much more unlucky the father or unhappy the son than would be any judge of sensitive honor over whose head there hung suspended the sword of dismissal in disgrace for any decision unpleasing to the popular will?

When the great Chief Justice John Marshall uttered his solemn and oft-quoted warning against an ignorant, a corrupt, and a dependent judiciary, he rightfully drew no distinction as to evil eminence between the three vices named, nor can I do so, unless indeed the poison of dependence be the most deadly of all. An ignorant judge may be informed, a corrupt judge may be detected and exposed, but a judge cowed into impotence or tempted to excess by dependence upon the constant favor of the appointing power or the continued smile of public approval is of all men most pitiable and most dangerous.

In an apparent effort to out-Herod Herod, a distinguished ex-President—eager as always to be newer than the newest, more original than the most original, and more progressive than the most advanced—has treated us to a variation of this theme and soberly proposes that in certain causes the decisions of the courts shall be reheard and revised by popular vote. The end sought by such a proposition from such a source is to accomplish what no other American has ever accomplished, and what patriots like Washington, and Jefferson, and Madison, and Monroe, and Jackson did not attempt, what Grant failed to attain, and what McKinley would have refused to consider had he lived. It is not a case surely where the end justifies the means, but at least it explains it. If a third term in the Presidency would be extraordinary and unique, the recall of judicial decisions would indeed be unique and extraordinary. But to those who think that this particular idea is actually new and because new is necessarily progressive, I commend the language of a great man, who, speaking of the forms of government, said that there is a—form of democracy in which not by law, but the multitude have the supreme power and supersede the law by their decrees. This is a state of affairs brought about by the demagogues, for in democracies which are subject to the law the best citizens hold the first place and there are no demagogues; but where the laws are not supreme there demagogues spring up. For the people becomes a monarch and is many in one; and the many have the power in their hands, not as individuals, but collectively. And the people, who is now a monarch and no longer under the control of law, seeks to exercise monarchial sway and grows into a despot; the flatterer is held in honor; this sort of democracy being relatively to other democracies what tyranny is to other forms of monarchy. The spirit of both is the same, and they alike exercise a despotic rule over the better citizens. The decrees of the voters correspond to the edicts of the tyrant, and the demagogue is to the one what the flatterer is to the other. Both have great power, the flatterer with the tyrant, the demagogue with democracies of the kind which we are describing. The demagogues make the decrees of the people override the laws, and refer all things to popular assembly. And therefore they grow great, because the people have all things in their hands, and they hold in their hands the votes of the people, who are too ready to listen to them. Further, those who have any complaints to bring against the magistrates say "let the people be judges"; the people are too happy to accept the invitation, and so the authority of every office is undermined. Such a democracy is fairly open to the objection that it is not a constitution at all, for where laws have no authority there is no constitution. The law ought to be supreme over all, and the magistracies and the government should judge of particulars.

Strange to say, these words were not written by an American statesman in criticism of the speech of a presidential candidate at Columbus, Ohio. They were uttered 2,400 years ago by Aristotle, the wisest of the Greeks.

Believe me, there is a surer and a safer road. "If judicial processes may be abused, we should guard them against abuse." If in the multitude of precedents and the clash of conflicting interests the courts have wandered from the path, let us resolutely call them back to it and by a statute such as the bill under discussion let us say: "This is the way; walk ye in it." Criticism of the courts is rife; let us disarm it.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion to content myself by quoting with approval the language of the great Italian statesman, Cavour, who said:

I am not an alarmist; nevertheless, without being one, I think we can see at least the possibility, if not the probability, of stormy times. Well, gentlemen, if you wish to take precautions against these stormy times, do you know the best way? It is to push reforms in quiet times, to reform abuses when these are not forced upon you by extremists.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 20840) to provide for deficiencies in the fund for police and firemen's pensions and relief in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

H. R. 18954. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 18337. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 18335. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War; and

H. R. 18955. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 17681) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. FOSTER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5930) to extend the time for the completion of dams across the Savannah River, by authority granted to Twin City Power Co. by an act approved February 29, 1908, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. NELSON, Mr. BOURNE, and Mr. FLETCHER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

REGULATION OF INJUNCTIONS.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how much time the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] has consumed on his side?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has consumed 75 minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. How much has he remaining?

The SPEAKER. He has consumed exactly half of his time—one hour and a quarter.

Mr. CLAYTON. So he has an hour and a quarter remaining. How much time has been consumed on this side?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 59 minutes left.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to consume at least 30 minutes of his time.

Mr. STERLING. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NYE].

Mr. NYE. Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all recognize the grave importance of the subject now before us. Whether the bill itself is so far-reaching in its importance as some think it is or not, the subject before the House is one, the importance of which can not be overestimated. Whatever may be the consequences of our action to us personally, we have no right to shrink from that duty which devolves upon us to deal with the subject as its importance requires. Daniel Webster, in his eulogy of Judge Story, said:

> Justice is the great interest of man on earth. It is the ligament that holds civilized beings and civilized nations together; wherever her temple stands, and so long as it is duly honored, there is a foundation for social security, general happiness, and the progress and improvement of our race. And whoever labors upon that temple with usefulness and distinction; whoever helps to clear its foundations, to strengthen its pillars, to adorn its entablatures, or helps to raise its august dome still higher in the sky, connects himself in name and fame and character with that which is and must be as durable as the frame of human society.

We deal with the great principles of justice to-day, and perhaps only time will tell whether our action shall add strength and beauty to this great temple of justice, of which Webster spoke, or whether its tendency shall be to weaken, and perhaps finally destroy, that which is sacred to all men, and more so to the laboring and toiling masses of this country than to any other class in the world.

We may differ, and honestly differ. But we should face this issue just exactly as it is. The real issue here has not been, I think, frankly presented—the issue which involves, as many think, the industrial and social well-being of the country, and I may say its political well-being also. The real issue has not been presented to-day. Let us fairly consider it and let us know what it is.

The long hearings that were had before the Committee on the Judiciary upon the subject of injunctions and contempt of court were not had upon this precise bill that is now presented. The real contention of organized labor, as I understand, or the representatives of organized labor, is that there should be a radical change in the administration of the law, or in the interpretation of the law, and that the courts have encroached upon the fundamental rights of the citizen.

The Pearre bill, which was before Congress for several sessions, contained radical provisions to the effect that the right to do business, or the good will in business, was not such a property right as would authorize the issuance of an injunction. It contained another radical provision—that an act committed by several persons jointly should not be regarded as criminal or a violation of the law and should not authorize the right of injunction unless the act when committed by a single individual would be so regarded. These are essential and vital contentions, which, as I understand, the distinguished leaders of labor organizations have insisted upon.

I am not able to subscribe to these provisions, but these were the main provisions contended for, and the Wilson bill, introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON], was really the bill which contained the provisions in the Pearre bill which I have referred to and which we considered in the Judiciary Committee. The Wilson bill was substantially the Pearre bill. I think the issue presented by organized labor should be fairly met and Congress should determine this great issue, for it is a great issue. If it be true that the law has been perverted and the courts have transgressed their authority on the equity side of their jurisdiction and to the detriment and oppression of the workingmen of America, that ought to be known. But this bill is far from the Wilson bill or the Pearre bill. Evidently the majority of the committee thought the demands of organized labor too radical and they reported in its place the bill now under consideration.

I do not know just why this bill was finally agreed upon by the majority of the committee and the Wilson bill so summarily disposed of, but this bill was at any rate substituted. There are some provisions in the present bill which are good, no doubt. If there is any means of correcting and improving the equitable procedure in the courts to the end of securing a greater degree of justice, I am certainly in favor of it. The great problem, it seems to me, is this, on the one hand to prevent abuses of the writ and on the other hand to leave in the courts all necessary power to prevent wrongs which nothing but a court of equity can prevent.

I know there has been much discussion here concerning the abuse of the writ. I do not care to enter into it. I know that labor leaders claim, and honestly claim, no doubt, that there have been numerous abuses. I know that the majority of the committee claim that there have been numerous abuses. In the long hearings we have had it seems to me there has been an almost total failure to show such abuses, although I have no doubt there are some and perhaps many. But even if there are, can we afford to change the administration of equity as it has been recognized for centuries? Is it safe to do so for the purpose of correcting whatever individual abuses there may be?

For my own part I have been reared and taught to respect, not alone justice in the abstract, but the human instrumentalities of justice through which it must be administered. And I believe in the courts; that judges are human; that they make mistakes; are sometimes governed too much, it may be, by passion I do not doubt, because I know that human nature is itself fallible. But I do contend that in the judiciary, with its courts scattered over the broad land in every locality, State and county, almost, as they are, with judges educated in the law and whose habits of thought lead them to study carefully questions coming before them, to ascertain the facts and reach true conclusions, we find the strongest element of national safety and stability. I claim that we have in the great judiciary of the American Nation our final hope and anchor. Whatever storms or danger the old ship of state may encounter, the judiciary will be the anchor and hope of the American people. [Applause.]

This House, sir, may be swayed by passion or prejudice, and so may the Senate, and so may the Executive. But, generally speaking, in the country at large, with this scattered judiciary of men who are high minded, men of integrity, honor, and learning, passion does not and can not sway the courts. It is the great steadying and conservative force of the Nation. In its preservation, its dignity, its honor, and its strength every honest citizen is concerned, the working classes most of all.

I say, therefore, Mr. Speaker, let us proceed with the utmost caution in any changes we may make in the law governing this great equity jurisdiction. Its function is to prevent wrong, and no one desiring to be free from any wrongdoing ought to fear it.

There are two principal criticisms upon the bill, which I will mention in the limited time I have. First, it seems to regulate the administration of equity rather according to the parties to the suit than the wrongs sought to be righted. In other words, the benefits sought are partial, and limited to that particular class of people who have been referred to in this debate as the working people of the country. I do not think the working people want special legislation, and no one, it seems to me, can read the bill and see how it emphasizes labor disputes and labor troubles without feeling that it is a bill shaped rather to accommodate certain parties than to deal with great principles applicable to everybody.

The second criticism is that it attempts to point out in advance those particular acts which shall not be enjoined. No human foresight or intelligence can do this with safety. It enumerates certain acts which are not now ordinarily the subject of injunction, but they are acts which under some circumstances may be vicious and dangerous to society.

My esteemed and learned colleague [Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania] pointed out in the report which we have signed where our courts have emphaasized and called attention to the fact that an act innocent under some circumstances may be wrongful in others, and this bill attempts to make the whole question dependent upon an act which may be innocent of itself but may constitute a step in a conspiracy that would be subversive of all law and order and all that is essential to private rights or social safety. I take the ground that we had better leave this great function of equity, imperfectly though it may be administered, than to attempt in our human intelligence to point out the specific acts which shall authorize a court of equity to act.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NYE. I will; but I think my time is about out.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I do not want to take up the gentleman's time, but does the gentleman think whether an act is criminal or not should be left to the discretion of the courts, rather than an attempt on the part of the majority to set those acts down?

Mr. NYE. I will say to the gentleman I see no way in the world in the practical administration of justice but to place in some human functionary the decision of the question whether the act is criminal or not, and that is the province of equity. Equity is that great conscionable side of the court whose province it is to prevent wrongs rather than to punish them. I believe that as civilization advances it has become necessary and will continue to become necessary, perhaps, to extend this equitable function rather than to curtail it. The individual judge is responsible to his community and to his State and to his country for any abuse of such necessary discretion. I will insert at this point in the RECORD certain observations of the minority, as follows:

The second paragraph of section 266C contains, to our mind, the most vicious proposal of the whole bill. It enumerates certain specific acts and provides that no restraining order or injunction shall prohibit the doing of them. Most of the acts thus recited are in themselves not amenable to the injunction process under existing law and practice. No court does or would enjoin them, but to declare by law that these acts should under no circumstances be restrained, we do not hesitate to say, is a proposal without precedent in the legislative history of this country. No legislature has ever proposed that any act, however innocent itself, should be sanctified irrespective of the motive or purpose of the actor. "No conduct," says Mr. Justice Holmes in Aiken v. Wisconsin (195 U. S., 194), "has such an absolute privilege as to justify all possible schemes of which it may be a part. The most innocent and constitutionally protected of acts or omissions may be made a step in a criminal plot, and if it is a step in a plot neither its innocence nor the Constitution is sufficient to prevent the punishment of the plot by law."

The majority have quoted various decisions in which particular acts under the pleadings presented to the court were held lawful and their prohibition denied. The same acts under other circumstances have been held unlawful and enjoined by the very courts, and in the course of the very decisions which the majority cites. Thus in Arthur v. Oakes (63 Fed. Rep., 310) Mr. Justice Harlan is quoted to sustain the proposition that no man can by injunction be required to perform personal service for another, and in that decision Justice Harlan eliminated from the injunction the words "and from so quitting the service of the said receivers with or without notice as to cripple the property or prevent or hinder the operation of said railroad." The majority must observe, however, that Mr. Justice Harlan likewise held, "But different considerations must control in respect to the words in the same paragraph of the writs of injunction, and from combining and conspiring to quit with or without notice the service of said receivers with the object and intention of crippling the property in their custody or embarrassing the operation of said railroad." Thus the same act of quitting is lawful under one set of circumstances and unlawful under another, because the concerted action in the first instance, in the opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan, "is a very different matter from a combination and conspiracy among employees with the object and intent not simply of quitting the service of the receivers because of the reduction of wages, but of crippling the property in their hands and embarrassing the operation of the railroad."

The majority undertakes to prescribe a set rule forbidding under any circumstances the enjoining of certain acts which may or may not be actuated by a malicious motive or be done for the purpose of working an unlawful injury or interfering with constitutional rights of employer and employee. In the same opinion Mr. Justice Harlan points out the impossibility of prescribing a set rule of this character and says, "The authorities all agree that a court of equity should not hesitate to use its power when the circumstances of the particular case in hand require it to be done in order to protect rights of property against irreparable damage by wrongdoers. It is as Justice Story said, 'because of the varying circumstances of cases that courts of equity constantly decline to lay down any rule which shall limit their power and discretion as to the particular cases in which such injunction shall be granted or withheld,'" and the authority proceeds, "there is wisdom in this course, for it is impossible to foresee all the exigencies of society which may require their aid and assistance to protect rights or redress wrongs. The jurisdiction of these courts thus operating by special injunction is manifestly indispensable for the purposes of social justice in a great variety of cases, and therefore should be fostered and upheld by a steady confidence." (Story, Equity Jurisprudence, sec. 959B; Arthur v. Oakes, 63 Fed., 328.)

Among the acts which the second paragraph of section 266C declares shall not be restrained is to prohibit any person or persons to terminate any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor or from recommending or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; of peaceably persuading any person to work or to abstain from working, or from ceasing to patronize or employ any party to such dispute or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do"; etc.

While many of these acts are in themselves entirely harmless and would never be enjoined by any court, yet under certain circumstances the same acts might become a weapon of lawless and destructive industrial warfare demanding the protection of the courts, this section would prevent the issuance of the injunction in the Debs case (In re Debs, 158 U. S., 564); it would prevent the issuance of the injunction in Toledo & Ann Arbor v. Pennsylvania Co. (54 Fed., 730); it would prevent the issuance of any injunction to restrain either workmen or employers who were the objects of the most vicious form of boycott that has been passed upon by the courts, or can be devised by the ingenuity of boycotters. It changes the remedies by which the Sherman Act may be enforced, inasmuch as if any of these acts enumerated in section 266C were the means employed to enforce the restraint of trade or to damage the interstate business of any individual or corporation no injunction could be obtained either by a private individual or by the Government against such acts.

In the Debs case a combination sought to paralyze the railroads of the United States and prevent the carrying of the mail until the railroad companies would agree not to haul Pullman cars because of a controversy between the Pullman Co. and certain of its employees who were not in the employ nor in any way related to the railroad companies. It is true there were acts of violence, but the general scheme was one of persuading all employees of the railroad companies to quit until the demands of the boycotters and strikers had been complied with.

In the Toledo & Ann Arbor case the famous rule 12 of the brotherhood provided that none of its members should handle the cars of any carrier with which members of the brotherhood were in a dispute. In that case the brotherhood employees of the Pennsylvania refused to handle cars of the Toledo & Ann Arbor because of a dispute between that road and some of the brotherhood, and they threatened to quit the service of the Pennsylvania road unles it agreed to violate the provisions of the interstate-commerce act by not affording equal facilities to the cars of another road. No violence was threatened. The brotherhood merely undertook to "peacefully persuade" the Pennsylvania company not to handle the cars of the other road under a threat of leaving their service—a thing which they had a perfect right to do to better their own condition, but not for the purpose of compelling the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. to violate the law.

The majority report quotes at length from the case of Pickett v. Walsh (192 Mass., 572), "and regret the necessity of limiting the quotations, because the whole opinion could be studied with profit." We agree with the majority that the whole opinion could have been studied with profit, since it condemns forms of "peaceful persuasion" from which the majority would withdraw equitable intervention. Speaking of the case before it, it says: "It is a refusal to work for A, with whom the strikers have no dispute, because A works for B, with whom the strikers have a dispute, for the purpose of forcing A to force B to yield to the strikers' demands. * * * It is a combination by the union to obtain a decision in their favor by forcing other persons who have no interest in the dispute to force the employer to decide the dispute in their favor. Such a strike is an interference with the right of the plaintiffs to pursue their calling as they think best. In our opinion, organized labor's right to coercion or compulsion is limited to strikes against the persons with whom the person has a trade dispute; or, to put it in another way, we are of the opinion that a strike against A, with whom the strikers have no trade dispute, to compel A to force B to the strikers' demands is unjustifiable interference with the right of A to carry on his calling as he thinks best. Only two cases to the contrary have come to our attention, namely, Bohn Manufacturing Co. v. Hollis (54 Minn., 223) and Jeans Clothing Co. v. Watson (168 Mo., 133)."

This case which the majority believe could be "studied with profit" is squarely against the proposal of their bill, and the two cases alluded to as being the only ones known to the court contrary to such view, for both have been overruled. Bohn Manufacturing Co. (54 Minn., 223) was overruled in Gray v. Building Trades Council (91 Minn., 171). The second case is alluded to by the majority of the committee in support of its contentions and the majority declare the logic of the court in that case "appears unanswerable." This "unanswerable" logic was overruled by the Supreme Court of Missouri in Lohse Patent Door Co. v. Fuel (215 Mo., 421).

The majority report also quotes in support of their contention from Vagelahm v. Gunter (167 Mass., 92), saying, "Justice Holmes, now of the Supreme Court of the United States, delivered the opinion." The opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Allen and is squarely against the contention of the majority, Mr. Justice Holmes having delivered a dissenting opinion in which he stood alone. The majority have been driven to the necessity of quoting from other dissenting opinions in support of their opposition, and to these we do not deem it necessary to give attention.

It is said by the majority that no question of constitutionality is involved. We submit that if the measure is to be construed, as it evidently is, to prevent the application of injunctive relief to certain acts in disputes between employer and employee which may be part of a scheme or plan to work irreparable injury, which acts could be enjoined in any other department of litigation, it is obvious that the parties affected would be denied the equal protection of the law and due process of law, coming well within the rule laid down in Connelly v. The Union Sewer Pipe Co. (184 U. S., 540); Goldberg v. Stablemen's Union (149 Cal., 429); Pierce v. Stablemen's Union (156 Cal., 70); and Niagara Fire Insurance Co. v. Cornell (110 Fed., 816).

We do not consider the English act of 1906, which is quoted by the majority as a precedent for some of its proposals. There is no parallel whatever between the conditions at which the English act is aimed and the fundamental restrictions of the organic law of this country having no similitude in the constitution of the British Empire. The peculiar privileges conferred upon trades-unions by the English act of 1906 are accompanied by disabilities and criminal provisions of so drastic a nature that if they were offered as any part of the legislation of this country we should deem it our duty to oppose them in the interest of all workingmen.

We agree with the majority that "liberty and more of it is safe in the hands of the workingmen of the country." We are convinced of the merit and truth of that contention. We do not, however, believe that liberty is advanced in the person of any citizen by stripping him of remedial protection through processes which have received the deliberate and mature approval of the English-speaking race during all the centuries of its history. We can not believe that the due protection of person and property under constitutional guaranties and by remedies tested by time is "an impediment to progress," or that the destruction of the essential remedies by which person and property receive protection is "a great social advance." We believe with the President of the United States, in a famous statement made by him many years since to the American Bar Association, "It will not be surprising if the storm of abuse heaped upon the Federal courts and the political strength of Federal groups, whose plans of social reforms have met obstructions in these tribunals, shall lead to serious efforts, through legislation, to cut down their jurisdiction and cripple their efficiency. If this comes, then the responsibility for its effects, whether good or bad, must be not only with those who urge the change, but also with those who do not strive to resist its coming." (Address to American Bar Association at Detroit, 1895.)

I believe the world is advancing. I believe it is getting better. I am glad that this opportunity has come on the floor of this House for every man to meet and honestly consider this great question. The world is moving, and it is moving in a more fraternal and humane spirit. Law is crystallized public opinion. Silently, slowly, but ever surely, it springs from the public mind and conscience and finds its way to the statute books. Industrially, socially, and politically this potent influence is at work. It is more fraternal than heretofore. Your workmen's compensation bill, which will soon come before the House, marks a new era in the history of this country, no matter whether it be passed in its exact form or not. The legislation for safety appliances, children's bureau, shorter hours, and improved conditions of labor, generally, all point to better days. Greater than parties, greater than party success, and greater even than any legislation we can enact is this mighty influence. I have more confidence in its potency than in legislation which, like this bill, seems to interfere with great equitable principles and with the equitable administration of the courts of the country. I believe we are moving in the right direction.

Some of us may go down, and quite possibly I may, because I oppose this legislation which organized labor, under its leadership, to-day insists should be enacted. If I could be convinced that such legislation is wise or right, no one would more cheerfully support it. My personal and political interests would be served by supporting it, if I were to be governed by these. It is because I can not believe it wise or just or permanently beneficial to our people, or any portion of them, that I have opposed it in the committee and on this floor.

I do not believe that the coercive policies of the past will long continue; neither the oppression of the employer nor the resentment of the employee can settle permanently great questions that are at stake.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NYE. My time is about out, but I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does the gentleman believe that when a workingman is charged with a crime that carries with it a penitentiary penalty or a prison penalty that he should have a right to a trial by jury?

Mr. NYE. Certainly; as to a crime I do. I recognize——

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is one of our present needs.

Mr. NYE. But I recognize, however, that the same act may be a crime which the public can actually and should actually punish and at the same time an offense against a court which the court, for the good administration of justice, must have the right to punish in order to protect itself. That, however, is not in this bill. The question of contempt is not in this bill, although very closely related. Gentlemen, there has been too much politics, too much shrinking from duty, in order that we may get votes. I am ready to lay down the public trust I hold if need be and close my brief service here. Personal consequences to me or to any of us are of little moment when compared with the permanent welfare of the country and all our people. Individuals may go up or go down, but the great tide of civilization moves on, I trust, to better conditions and to a more fraternal spirit. We are coming to recognize labor as the foundation of all, that it is the philosopher's stone that transmutes all substances into gold, and that it should have its just and righteous share of that which it produces, and because that feeling is growing in the human heart the future of the American laborer and the future of the employer, too, is brighter than it ever was before. Unity is to-day the motto and ought to be of our civilization. Coercive policies can not permanently prevail. Peace on earth, good will to men—all men. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MARTIN of Colorado). Fifty-nine minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. How much time has the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] has 47 minutes.

Mr. STERLING. I think I have 57 minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is that correct?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has 47 minutes remaining.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania used 1 hour and 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NYE] 28 minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. According to my mathematics, 47 minutes is right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is advised that that is correct.

Mr. CLAYTON. And the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] has 47 minutes, and I have how much?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Fifty-nine minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS].

[Mr. THOMAS addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] consume at least 10 or 15 minutes of his time now.

Mr. STERLING. How many speakers has the gentleman on that side? I think the gentleman ought to exhaust all the time except for the closing speech.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have quite a number of gentlemen who want to speak.

Mr. STERLING. There is but one more speech to be made on this side, and I think the gentleman ought to reserve time for only one on that side to close the debate.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think that is quite fair, but I thought the gentleman was going to have several more speakers.

Mr. STERLING. Only one more.

Mr. CLAYTON. With that understanding, then, I will proceed with this side. I now yield, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] 15 minutes. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

[Mr. SHERLEY addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have 29 minutes remaining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 29 minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL].

[Mr. KENDALL addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I am unwilling to commit this side of the House in opposition to this bill. The party, by its authoritative declarations, has declared in favor of this legislation. For almost a decade Republican Presidents have recommended it to Congress. It would be recreancy on the part of this side of the Chamber if they did not support a reasonable and fair measure presented, having the avowed purpose of this bill.

I do not believe that we can justify ourselves in opposing this bill upon any slight grounds or verbal criticism that may be made with regard to some of its provisions. After a somewhat careful consideration of its terms I am able to say that in my judgment it will do no harm to any property interest of a legitimate character in the United States; it will do no harm to the employer of labor nor to those who work for him, and it will be of incalculable good in settling disputed propositions that have been subject to controversy for many years. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the enactment of this measure, although in my judgment it does not go as far as a measure dealing with the injunctive process, in view of the abuses of it, should go. In my judgment the bill that would best serve the interest of the people of this country at this time is a bill that would draw a distinct dividing line between the property rights and personal relationship, leaving the adjudication of property and property rights to the equity courts and the adjudication of disputes in personal relationship to the law courts.

This bill does not do that, but it goes a long way toward adjusting the difficulties under which workingmen have labored when injunctions have been issued against them in labor disputes.

I take it that there is practically no opposition to any portion of this bill except the last section. In the brief time I have at my disposal I want to call the attention of the House to some of the provisions of the last clause of the bill, and will avail myself of the opportunity to extend my remarks in the RECORD, in order that I may more fully discuss the principles involved in the proposed legislation.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] declares that the bill now under consideration exempts organizations of farmers and wage workers from the operations of the Sherman antitrust law, and for that reason he is opposed to the measure. The gentleman is mistaken in his conception of the scope of this bill. The only way in which this measure modifies the Sherman antitrust law is in limiting the use of the injunction process where no property right is involved.

There has been some doubt expressed as to whether or not the Sherman antitrust law was ever intended to apply to organizations of workingmen and farmers when dealing with their own labor or the products of their own labor; but whether or not it was intended to apply to organizations of that character, the fact remains that it has been applied to them. An examination of the debates in the Senate discloses the fact that the author of the law, Senator Sherman, did not intend it to be and did not believe that it would be applied to organizations of workingmen or farmers. In the debate on the bill in the Senate on March 21 and March 24, 1890, Senators Hiscock and Teller called attention to the possibility of the measure applying to organizations of that character. Replying, Senator Sherman said:

> The bill as reported contains three or four simple propositions which relate only to contracts, combinations, agreements made with a view and designed to carry out a certain purpose which the laws of all the States and of every civilized community declare to be unlawful. It does not interfere in the slightest degree with voluntary associations made to affect public opinion to advance the interests of a particular trade or occupation. It does not interfere with the Farmers' Alliance at all, because that is an association of farmers to advance their interests and to improve the growth and manner of production of their crops and to secure intelligent growth and to introduce new methods. No organizations in this country can be more beneficial in their character than farmers' alliances and farmers' associations. They are not business combinations. They do not deal with contracts, agreements, etc. They have no connection with them. And so the combinations of workingmen to promote their interests, promote their welfare, and increase their pay, if you please, to get their fair share in the division of production, are not affected in the slightest degree, nor can they be included in the words or intent of the bill as now reported.

There is a great difference in the effect upon the community between an association of farmers organized for their general welfare to protect themselves against the price of the products of their labor being arbitrarily depressed by the real combinations in restraint of trade, or associations of workingmen organized for the purpose of promoting their welfare and disposing of their labor power to the best advantage, and the combinations of those who deal in the products of labor for the purpose of being able to force down the price paid to the producer and force up the prices paid by the consumer. In the case of the former the welfare of the community is protected; in that of the latter the welfare of the community is injured.

The extension of the writ of injunction from the field of the protection of property rights into the personal relationship between man and man is a renaissance of the theory of government by discretion long since discarded by the Anglo-Saxon people.

For more than a thousand years there has been a continual conflict between the principle of government by law and the practice of government by discretion with the discretion vested first in the King and later in his representative, the chancellor or judge. Government by law is a government of democracy; government by discretion is a government of autocracy.

Injunctions in labor disputes are innovations in our modern jurisprudence. The original purpose for which injunctions were issued was to restrain parties to any dispute about the title or damages to property from interfering with the property in question, until the courts had determined the property rights involved. These restrainng orders were made returnable at the next term of court, or at the session of court where the cases were to be heard and determined, and consequently were never permanent, expiring by their own limitations when the court had convened to determine the question at issue. That they are clearly intended to protect property rights and property rights only is demonstrated by the fact that the courts invariably insist upon a bond being furnished by the parties suing out the writ to indemnify the parties enjoined for any loss that may accrue to them by virtue of the writ having been issued. When such an order of court has been issued it is not a difficult matter for the court to determine the actual damages, if any, that have been sustained through the issuance of the injunction, thereby protecting the restrained parties against any unwarranted invasion of their rights, but when the court issues an injunction in a labor dispute, restraining persons in controversy with employers from doing those things that they have a legal and moral right to do, and as a result of that injunction the contest is lost to the workers, there is no court on earth that can determine the damage that has been sustained by the persons enjoined, and consequently they can not recover from the bond. When the court arrogates to itself the power to issue injunctions never contemplated by the rules of equity, and in direct violation of constitutional and statutory law, and assumes the right to issue injunctions for the purpose of enforcing criminal law, it departs from the domain of property rights and invades that of personal rights in a manner for which there can be no excuse except that the court thereby becomes the sole judge of the law and the fact, and, if the parties enjoined are declared guilty of contempt, the extent of the punishment. All of which is in direct violation of the fundamental laws of the land and the Anglo-Saxon concept of human liberty, as shown by the efforts of the people for more than a thousand years to destroy the arbitrary automatic power of kings and judges.

The peace of Wedmore, concluded between Alfred the Great and Guthram the Dane, A. D. 878, provided that "If a King's thane be charged with the killing of a man, if he dares to clear himself let it be before 12 King's thanes."

The great charter of human liberty, the Magna Charta of Great Britain, the basis upon which British and American freedom rests, in clause 39 declares:

> No freeman shall be taken or imprisoned, disseized, or outlawed, or banished, or any ways destroyed, nor will we pass upon him, nor will we send upon him, save by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land.

The Bill of Rights enunciated by the British Parliament for the protection of the common people and signed by William and Mary upon their accession to the British throne, as a condition upon which their title to sovereignty would rest, declares:

Paragraph 1. That the pretended power of suspending of laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, without consent of Parliament, is illegal.

Paragraph 2. That the pretended power of dispensing with laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, as it hath been assumed and exercised of late, is illegal.

The Declaration of Independence declares: "That all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, and that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," and it further assigns as one of the causes for the separation from the mother country and the establishment of an independent government, "for depriving us in many cases of the benefits of trial by jury."

The Constitution of the United States, which creates our judiciary, gives to it whatever power it can possibly exercise, and limits its jurisdictions, says, Article III, section 1: "The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority."

First amendment. Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Sixth amendment. In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

Ninth amendment. The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

Tenth amendment. The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

Thirteenth amendment, section 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

It must be apparent to even the most casual investigators that the courts of the United States hold the same relationship to the Government of our country that the courts of Great Britain held and now hold to the regal power. No one will contend that any judge in Great Britain, either at the time of the adoption of our Constitution or since that time, could have any greater power than that conferred by regal authority expressed by the Parliament and approved by the King. It naturally follows that our courts can have no greater power than that granted to them by the Constitution.

When the Constitution granted to our judiciary jurisdiction in equity it was only such power in equity as arises under the Constitution and the laws, and it could not have conveyed any wider authority than that which existed in English jurisprudence at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and the quotations cited from the Magna Charta, the Bill of Rights, and the Declaration of Independence absolutely deny the right of equity courts to create laws regulating the relations between man and man where no property right exists. Our Government is not only one of delegated powers but also of reserved powers. The same instrument that created the judiciary and delegated powers to it reserves all the powers that are not thus delegated to the various States and to the people. When, therefore, any court assumes to exercise powers not delegated to it by the Constitution, it invades the rights specifically reserved by that document to the States and people.

Notwithstanding the constitutional limitations mentioned, modern injunctions have taken three distinct lines, two of which are unconstitutional, arbitrary, and unjust.

1. Injunctions are issued to protect property rights from irreparable injury where there is no remedy at law. That is the only province in which an injunction properly belongs.

2. Injunctions have unwarrantably been issued for the purpose of enforcing existing statutory and common law arbitrarily invading the jurisdiction of the legislatures and the law courts, thus wiping out of existence that protection against false accusations that freemen have fought for and forced from the hands of autocratic kings and tyrannical governments and defended at the cost of their lives, in many conflicts with royalty, the right of trial by jury.

When the legislative branch of the Government has specified the punishment for any violation of law, it has provided what, in its judgment, is an adequate remedy and means of protection, and having provided such remedy no court has any right to step in over the head of the legislature and provide another remedy.

3. Modern American courts assume the right to issue injunctions interfering with the personal rights of men in exercising free speech, free press, peaceable assemblage, and in their personal relationship with each other. The rights of free speech, free press, and peaceable assemblage are specifically guaranteed by the Constitution. They are the fundamental safeguards of a free people which neither courts, kings, nor cajolery should be permitted to destroy. The personal relationship between man and man comes clearly within the jurisdiction of the law courts and has no place in the courts of equity, unless upon the assumption by the courts that man is property, an assumption repugnant to the sense of right of all civilized communities and specifically forbidden by the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

As the judicial power extends only to cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution, the laws of the United States, or treaties made under their authority, it seems clear that, aside from equity proceedings growing out of the treaties, the only equity power which the judiciary can exercise is to be found in the original jurisdiction granted by the Constitution and such additional jurisdiction as may be conveyed by law. The original jurisdiction granted by the Constitution, aside from that already stated, is found in section 2 of Article III of the Constitution, which provides that it shall extend to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States; and between a State or the citizens thereof and foreign States, citizens, or subjects. Even that power is limited by the eleventh amendment, which says, "The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State."

In all other cases the judicial power extends to cases arising under the law. Congress has on various occasions created courts and limited the jurisdiction of the courts thus created. That is true of the Court of Claims and the Commerce Court. There is no question in the mind of your committee of the constitutional power of Congress to limit the jurisdiction of the courts so that it will not extend to the writ of injunction in the cases mentioned in the bill. The extent to which the judicial power has been exercised in recent years in issuing writs of injunction in labor disputes in a manner which would not be considered if no disputes were in existence makes it necessary that some legislation of this character should be enacted. The first writs of this character issued restrained acts of violence only. From that they have gradually broadened until it has become the practice to enjoin men from inducing others to leave their employment or not to enter employment, or from assembling at, near, or within sight of the complainant's property, or from furnishing food, money, or other things of value to workmen on strike, or from moving strikers away from the strike locality, or from exercising the constitutional right of free speech or of free press, or from refusing to patronize people who are obnoxious to them.

It may be that some of these things which they are restrained from doing are wrong, and that they should not be permitted to do them; but if that be true, the legislative branch of the Government should prohibit by law the things that are wrong, and the law courts, not the equity courts, determine the fact of whether or not there has been any violation of the law. By any other course a grave injustice is done to that portion of our people who are least able to protect themselves.

During the Presidential campaign of 1908 Mr. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, issued a circular letter to the members of that body, expressing his views and the views of organized labor generally on the use and abuse of the writ of injunction by which the equity courts have exceeded their jurisdiction and invaded the jurisdiction of the law courts and the legislative branch of the Government.

Mr. Roosevelt was then President of the United States. He immediately proceeded, in the form of a letter to Senator Knox, to criticize the position taken by Mr. Gompers.

In view of the criticisms of the courts which have been made by Mr. Roosevelt in his present campaign for the Presidency, his position at that time is of more than passing interest, and I therefore desire to include in the RECORD the circular letter of Mr. Gompers, the letter of President Roosevelt to Senator Knox, and an editorial from the American Federationist, written by Mr. Gompers, in reply to the letter of President Roosevelt.

CIRCULAR LETTER OF MR. GOMPERS.

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., October 12, 1908.

Men of labor, lovers of human liberty, you are believers in the form of government described by the immortal Lincoln as government of the people, for the people, and by the people. You would not be true Americans if you were not. This form of government—the democratic form—is a government by law and is the direct opposite of the despotic form, which is government by discretion. Government by injunction is government by discretion, in other words, despotic. You would not willingly assist in destroying our present form of government in the United States, and I therefore assume that you would have the issue in this campaign stated plainly and simply, in order that you may do your duty.

The facts are that the judiciary, induced by corporations and trusts and protected by the Republican Party, is, step by step, destroying government by law and substituting therefor a government by judges, who determine what, in their opinion, is wrong; what, in their opinion, is evidence; who, in their opinion, is guilty; and what, in their opinion, the punishment shall be. It is sought to make of the judges irresponsible despots, and by controlling them using this despotism in the interest of corporate power.

In order to do this, it was necessary to proceed secretively to prevent opposition becoming too strong; some strained "justification," for it had to be sought in the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution provides that judges shall have jurisdiction in law and equity, and by extending the jurisdiction of judges "sitting in equity" all safeguards erected to protect human liberty are swept aside.

Instead of the accuser proving the guilt of the accused, the accused is compelled to show cause why he should not be punished. The absolute power, in specific instances, of a judge sitting in chancery (which is the real name for equity) is gradually extended over the several fields of human activity, and a revolution is perfected. We then have despotic government by the judiciary in place of government of, for, and by the people.

This revolution has already progressed very far. It is depriving the workers of their rights as citizens by forbidding the exercise of freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly, and the right of petition, if, in the opinion of the judge, the exercise of these rights may work injury to the business of some corporation or trust. It is applicable to the worker to-day, and will inevitably be made applicable to the business man at a later period.

The progress of this revolution must be stopped.

We must return to government by law in all instances where the revolution has been successful.

This virus and poison has not only attacked the judicial branch of government, but has in several instances entered upon the legislative field, by making laws which may be enforced by equity process; that is, the judge is by law authorized to—

Disregard all accepted rules of procedure and of evidence; to Dispense with jury trial and substitute instead of these safeguards of human liberty his own opinion of what is right.

It was with these serious thoughts in mind that labor's representatives submitted to the party in power—the Republican Party—in 1906 labor's bill of grievances, and respectfully urged that necessary legislation be enacted. Nothing was done.

Injunction after injunction was issued forbidding men to assist each other, to give information to each other, and to do in unison those things which it was the undisputed right of the individual to do for himself.

In the meantime the dispute between the Hatters' Union and Mr. Loewe, of Danbury, was in progress from one court to another, until it reached the United States Supreme Court, where is was decided that—

Organizations of working men and working women, for mutual aid and assistance, are combinations in illegal restraint of trade under the so-called Sherman antitrust law.

That anyone injured thereby may recover threefold damages from the organizations, and if they have not the means, then from individual members thereof. Between this law, enforceable by equity process and the extension of the use of the writ of injunction, the individual freedom of the worker to combine with others for mutual aid and protection is swept away and his rights as a citizen disregarded and denied.

For all these steadily growing, dangerous tendencies there is but one remedy—legislation by the people through their proper representatives. Again we appealed to Congress, and again our answer was a distinct and emphatic "no."

We drafted and caused to be introduced in Congress specific bills to stay and remedy the evil, but to no purpose.

Labor was not only given an emphatic "no," but it was coupled with a statement by candidate for Vice President, Mr. SHERMAN, accepted and approved by the majority of Congress, that his party fully understood what was doing, and accepted all responsibility both for what it did and what it did not do.

It is no attack upon the judges to say that they are men with a fair average quality of human nature; that they are subject to the prejudices and passions of men. They can not divest themselves of their humanity by putting on the judicial ermine any more than can the king divest himself of his by putting on the crown.

Despotic power under the ermine is as dangerous as despotic power under the crown. To stay its progress, some remedy must be had, and we therefore appealed to the Republican convention at Chicago and were given the same answer in still more insulting language if that were possible. We asked for bread, and they showed us a whip, and in order to be certain that the whip will be effectually used the Republican Party nominated as its standard bearer Mr. William H. Taft, the originator and specific champion of discretionary government; that is, government by injunction. In passing, I may say that his nomination, under the circumstances, was logical. It would have been impossible for the party to find a more effective representative of its policy.

Labor's representatives then went to the Democratic Party. That party made labor's contention its own. It pledged its candidates for every office to those remedies which labor had already submitted to Congress. The standard bearer of the Democratic Party, Mr. William J. Bryan, entered fully into the essence of this struggle and declared that the real issue in this campaign is: "Shall the people rule?"

The Republican Party and its candidate stand for upholding and further extending into our country a despotic government vested in the judiciary.

The Democratic Party and its candidate stand for government by law vested in the people.

As an American citizen, in view of these facts, I have no choice—I have only duty. Duty to preserve with my voice, pen, and ballot that form of government for the preservation of which Lincoln said, "Men died at Gettysburg."

Human freedom and equality of all men before the law is the result of the struggle of the ages, and our holiest inheritance. This we must regain; this we must extend, so that it shall be a living, character-making, conduct-governing principle in American life.

Labor has been and will be accused of partisanship, but in performing a solemn duty at this time in support of a political party labor does not become partisan to a political party, but partisan to a principle.

As the campaign progresses, accusations, misrepresentations of all conceivable kind will come thick and fast. In answer to them all, I have but to say that men who have given a whole life's energy to the great cause of labor and who in all the years gone by have been found faithful, honest, and sincere are not likely to change their character all of a sudden. If we were desirous of either office or other emoluments, they could have been obtained with greater ease from the party in power.

I have said before and now say again that there is no political office in the gift of the American people, elective or appointive, that I would under any circumstances accept. Not that such offices could be lightly put aside by an American citizen, but that I believe I can do more for the ideas that I cherish and the work in which I am engaged, either as an official or as a member in the rank and file of the labor movement, and the threats of politicians to "burn brush fires" behind me wherever I may go; to "create rebellion" in the labor movement against me and bring about my defeat for the presidency of the Federation can have no influence upon my mind and can not alter my course. As workers and citizens we have our franchise; as citizens we must use it to protect and extend equality of all men before the law and secure individual liberty for all men.

And now, fellow workers and friends of human liberty, labor calls upon you to be true to yourselves and to each other, to stand faithfully by our friends and elect them, oppose and defeat our enemies, whether they be candidates for President, for Congress, or other offices, whether executive, legislative, or judicial.

Sincerely and faithfully, yours,

SAML. GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

LETTER OF PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT TO SENATOR KNOX.

WASHINGTON, October 21, 1908.

MY DEAR SENATOR KNOX: In your admirable speech of yesterday you speak of the action of Mr. Bryan and certain gentlemen claiming to be the special representatives of organized labor, foremost among them Mr. Gompers, to secure the support of laboring men for Mr. Bryan on consideration of his agreement to perform certain acts nominally in the interests of organized labor, which would really be either wholly ineffective or else of widespread injury not only to organized labor but to all decent citizens throughout this country. You have a peculiar right to speak on labor questions, for it was you, who, as Attorney General, first actively invoked the great power of the Federal Government on behalf of the rights of labor when for the first time in the history of the Government, you, speaking for the Department of Justice, intervened in a private lawsuit which had gone against the widow of a brakeman and by your intervention secured from the Supreme Court a construction of the safety-appliance act which made it a vital remedial statute, and therefore has secured to hundreds of crippled employees compensation which they would not otherwise have obtained.

LETTER FROM GOMPERS.

The daily papers of October 13 contain an open letter from Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, appealing to workingmen to vote for Mr. Bryan.

In that letter are certain definite statements which interest the wider American public quite as much as those to whom Mr. Gompers makes his appeal. These statements warrant all you have said in your speech, and they would warrant you in asking Mr. Bryan to say publicly whether Mr. Gompers states correctly the attitude of his party and himself on a subject that is of vital concern to every citizen, including every business man as well as every farmer and every laboring man, who looks to the courts for the protection of his rights.

Mr. Gompers in his letter asserts that the judiciary of this country is destroying democratic government and substituting therefor an irresponsible and corrupt despotism in the interests of corporate power, and he further makes clear that the means by which he believes this alleged despotism has been set up in the place of democracy is by the process of injunction in the courts of equity.

Mr. Gompers in his letter states that his appeal to the Republican convention at Chicago for remedy against the injunction was denied, and he then goes on to state not only that the Democratic Party promised a remedy, but promised him the particular remedy that he had already asked of Congress.

His words are:

"Labor's representatives then went to the Democratic Party. That party made labor's contentions its own. It pledged its candidates for every office to those remedies which labor had already submitted to Congress."

The last sentence in this quotation indicates very definitely the specific remedies to which Mr. Gompers understands Mr. Bryan's party has pledged itself.

His statement now makes perfectly clear an important plank in the Bryanite platform which has heretofore seemed puzzling to a vast number of earnest-minded, thinking people who are sincerely interested in the steady advance and the legitimate aspirations of labor, and who carefully read both platforms to know precisely what hopes each held out for the improvement of the condition of wage earners.

That plank reads as follows:

"Questions of judicial practice have arisen, especially in connection with industrial disputes. We deem that the parties to all judicial proceedings should be treated with rigid impartiality, and that injunctions should not be issued in any cases in which injunctions would not issue if no industrial dispute were involved."

REMEDY PROMISED.

This is the plank that promises the "remedy" against injunctions which Mr. Gompers asked of Mr. Bryan's party. In actual fact it means absolutely nothing; no change of the law could be based on it; no man without inside knowledge could foretell what its meaning would turn out to be, for no man could foretell how any judge would decide in any given case, as the plank apparently leaves each judge free to say when he issues an injunction in a labor case whether or not it is a case in which an injunction would issue if labor were not involved. Yet this plank is apparently perfectly clear to Mr. Gompers, and in his letter to his followers he indicates beyond question just what he understands it to mean. He asserts that he has the requisite inside knowledge. His statement that it was Mr. Bryan's party—for it was Mr. Bryan who dictated the platform—pledged itself "to those remedies which labor had already submitted to Congress" is a perfectly clear and definite statement.

The "remedies" which Mr. Gompers has already submitted to Congress are matters of record and the identification of his "remedy" against injunctions in labor disputes is easy and certain. This "remedy" is embodied in House bill No. 94 of the first session of the Sixtieth Congress, the complete text of which is hereto appended.

The gist of the bill, as can be seen by referring to the complete text, is this:

First. After forbidding any Federal judge to issue a restraining order for an injunction in any labor dispute, except to prevent irreparable injury to property or a property right, it specifically provides that "no right * * * to carry on business of any particular kind, or at any particular place, or at all, shall be construed, held, considered, or treated as property or as constituting a property right."

Second. It provides that nothing agreed upon or done by two or more parties in connection with a labor dispute shall constitute a conspiracy or other criminal offense or be prosecuted as such unless the thing agreed upon or done would be unlawful if done by a single individual.

The bill here described is not only the "remedy" that Mr. Gompers has "already submitted to Congress," but it is the one and only remedy which he and those associated with him in his present movement have announced that they will accept in the matter of his grievance against the courts on the injunction issue.

FEDERATION ON RECORD.

The counsel for the American Federation of Labor and Mr. Gompers, its president, are both on record to this effect.

At a hearing before the House Committee on the Judiciary the counsel for the American Federation of Labor on February 5, 1908 (as appears from the printed hearings), stated:

"The bill was considered by at least two sessions of the executive council of that organization and unanimously approved. It was considered by two of its national conventions—the two latest—and by them unanimously indorsed. And in the face of many propositions to amend it, in the face of many proposed substitutes, in the face of pressure from every direction, from high sources and sources not so exalted, the organization has stood by and is to-day standing by this bill without amendments."

Mr. Gompers himself in discussing this bill before the same committee on February 28, 1908 (as appears from the printed hearings), went on record as follows:

"Events have demonstrated clearly to my mind that there is only one bill before the committee that can at all be effective to deal with this abuse, with this invasion of human rights, and that is the Pearre bill."

Further on in the same page of the hearings, Mr. Gompers states:

"I will say this, that I think I will try to make my position clear that the American Federation of Labor has so declared itself that it must insist upon the principles involved in the Pearre bill, and that I explained as best I could the position of labor—that we would rather be compelled to bear the wrongs which we have for a longer period than to give our assent to the establishment of a wrong principle, believing and knowing that time would give the justice and relief to which labor—the working people—are entitled."

DEMAND OF GOMPERS.

This bill, then, and none other, represents exactly the relief that Mr. Gompers demands in the way of anti-injunction legislation; and if the statement in his letter is correct, this bill represents what Mr. Bryan and his party are pledged to in the matter of anti-injunction legislation.

The injunction plank in the Bryanite platform may sound vague and hazy, but there is nothing vague or hazy about this bill.

It is more than a bill; it is a program of the most fixed and definite kind; and if Mr. Gompers is correct this bill becomes, as it were, an authorized appendix to Mr. Bryan's platform, or a footnote explaining in detail the briefer and vaguer injunction plank in that platform.

Does Mr. Bryan accept it as such?

Mr. Bryan should state publicly whether he in fact accepts the principle of this bill, which is the official program of Mr. Gompers and those who stand with him.

Mr. Gompers announces publicly that Mr. Bryan's party has made this program its own. Is Mr. Gompers correct in this statement?

Either Mr. Gompers is mistaken as to what Mr. Bryan's party has promised him in this matter of anti-injunction legislation or those who drafted his party's platform in their haste failed to make the promise so clear that the general public would understand it precisely as Mr. Gompers understood it.

Mr. Bryan failed in his letter of acceptance to discuss this labor plank of his party's platform. So far as I am aware he has failed to discuss it since.

There should be such discussion as a matter of common fairness, not only to labor, but to all citizens alike. On a question of such grave consequence the people are entitled to know where Mr. Bryan stands.

Mr. Taft has repeatedly explained exactly where he stands in this matter of regulating injunctions.

Are we not entitled to know with equal clearness exactly where Mr. Bryan stands?

Mr. Gompers's public statements as to what his party has promised make it imperative that Mr. Bryan declare himself.

This bill, to the principle of which he says Mr. Bryan is pledged, declares that the right to carry on a lawful business in lawful way shall not be regarded as a property right or entitled to the protection of a court of equity through the process of an injunction, and that the right to such protection, which admittedly now exists under the law, shall be taken away.

WHAT GOMPERS PLANNED.

The counsel for the American Federation of Labor in his argument before the House committee on February 5, at which Mr. Gompers himself was present, gave a very frank illustration of what he and Mr. Gompers perceived to be the consequences of that provision of this bill which says that the right to carry on business shall not be entitled to protection as a property right.

His words are: "Suppose that working men by some operation or proceedings in the community (let us say by violence or persuasion or picketing away from the premises) reduce those works to a state of utter helplessness and there was not a wheel moving nor a process in operation and this company had no help at all—that would be an interference with his right to do business, and for that I say he has no right to be protected by injunction."

Is Mr. Bryan in reality pledged to this point of view?

Will he definitely say, either in writing or in public address, whether he believes with Mr. Gompers that the protection heretofore afforded by the courts of equity to the right to carry on a lawful business in a lawful way is despotic power, and that the judges who exercise that power are irresponsible despots?

So far as the second section of this bill is concerned it is perfectly clear that it would legalize the blacklist and the sympathetic boycott carried to any extent. It would legalize acts which have time and again been declared oppressive, unjust, and immoral by the best and most eminent labor leaders themselves.

Does Mr. Bryan believe that Mr. Gompers, that he and that part of the labor movement that agrees with him, has the right morally, and should be given the right legally, to paralyze or to destroy with impunity the business of an innocent third person against whom neither he nor they have any direct grievance simply because the third person refuses to join with them aggressively in a labor controversy with the real merits of which he may be utterly unacquainted, because he refuses to class as his enemy any and every other employer whom they point out as their enemy, because he refuses merely upon their peremptory order to excommunicate some other employer by ceasing all business relations with him? The blacklist and the secondary boycott are two of the most cruel forms of oppression ever devised by the wit of man for the infliction of suffering on his weaker fellows.

DESPOTIC POWER.

No court could possibly exercise any more brutal, unfeeling, or despotic power than Mr. Gompers claims for himself and his followers in the legislation which would permit them without let or hindrance of any kind to carry on every form and degree of the secondary boycott.

The anthracite strike commission, as fair-minded and distinguished a body of men as ever passed judgment on an industrial question, thus refers to the secondary form of boycott—that is, the boycott of innocent third persons for refusing to take an aggressive part in a controversy with which they have no concern:

"To say this is not to deny the legal right of any man or set of men voluntarily to refrain from social intercourse or business relations with any persons whom he or they, with or without good reason, dislike. This may sometimes be unchristian, but it is not illegal. But when it is a concerted purpose of a number of persons not only to abstain themselves from such intercourse but to render the life of their victim miserable by persuading and intimidating others so to refrain such purpose is a malicious one, and the concerted attempt to accomplish it is a conspiracy at common law and merits and should receive the punishment due to such a crime."

The commission further states that this boycott can be carried to an extent "which was condemned by Mr. Mitchell, president of the United Mine Workers of America, in his testimony before the commission, and which certainly deserves the reprobation of all thoughtful and law-abiding citizens."

Does Mr. Bryan agree with Mr. Gompers that all existing legal restraint on the enforcement of every degree of the boycott should be withdrawn, that the industrial excommunication of the innocent merchant who refuses to render unquestioned obedience to the orders of Mr. Gompers should be legalized and encouraged, or does he believe with us and with Mr. Mitchell and other labor leaders who differ with Mr. Gompers in this matter that this form of the boycott is morally wrong, that labor at war should fight with its enemies and respect the rights of neutrals, that innocent third parties should not be coerced into taking sides in industrial disputes to which they are in no sense parties, under penalty of having their business attacked and destroyed?

Mr. Taft is perfectly definite on this proposition.

Where does Mr. Bryan stand.

The citizen who votes for or against Mr. Taft on this proposition does so with his eyes open and with a clear understanding from Mr. Taft himself of his position. He has frankly discussed this subject time and again with workingmen themselves, both in this campaign and prior to his nomination. He has been willing to express his position clearly and to assure workingmen that to protect them in their rights he is willing to go to the limits of what he considers justice, but that he will not go further. His definition of justice to labor does not, as we understand it, include either of the principles contained in Mr. Gompers's program, as set forth officially in this bill.

Does Mr. Bryan disagree with Mr. Taft on these propositions?

Will he state publicly, definitely, categorically, whether he accepts the program outline in this bill, as Mr. Gompers in his letters has assured the public that he does?

TRIBUTE FROM BRYAN.

Mr. Bryan's party platform paid a high tribute to our courts of justice. It stated:

"We resent the attempt of the Republican Party to raise a false issue respecting the judiciary. It is an unjust reflection upon a great body of our citizens to assume that they lack respect for the courts."

The "great body of our citizens" to whom this platform refers is admittedly Mr. Gompers and his followers.

Mr. Gompers, now Mr. Bryan's open and avowed ally, has in the better quoted attacked the Federal courts in unmeasured terms of reproach because by a long line of decisions the equity courts have refused to make an outlaw of the business man, because his right to carry on a lawful business under the peace of the law has been protected by the process of injunction, because, in a word, one of the most vital and most fundamental rights of the business world, the right of a business man to carry on his business, has been sustained and not denied by the processes of the courts of equity. This sweeping attack of Mr. Gompers upon the judiciary has been made in a frank and open effort to secure votes for Mr. Bryan.

Are these attacks made with Mr. Bryan's consent?

Do they meet with his approval?

Does he indorse them or does he repudiate them?

Mr. Bryan has frankly questioned Mr. Taft during the progress of this campaign, and very properly so, and has asked him to make clear his personal stand on public matters upon which the public was entitled to be enlightened.

In turn, with equal frankness and with equal propriety, Mr. Bryan should be asked to break a long-continued silence and make definite and certain his own position in regard to a matter that concerns not only business men and every decent law-abiding citizen, whether a wageworker or not, just as much as it concerns Mr. Gompers and that part of organized labor that stands with him.

There is no need of generalities, of vague expressions of sympathy for labor. Let Mr. Bryan simply confine himself to the anti-injunction plank of his own platform and tell us publicly, definitely, and clearly whether he accepts or rejects the statement of Mr. Gompers that this plank pledges him to the principles of the bill for which Mr. Gompers stands and whether if elected he will endeavor to have this proposal enacted into the law. This is asked honestly in the interest of that large voting public which believes sincerely in the promotion of every legitimate right and interest of labor, but which believes also that from the standpoint of the best interest of labor it neither requires nor is entitled to more than justice, and that the right to destroy business should not be formally recognized in the law of the land.

REALIZES RIGHT TO SPEAK.

I feel that I have the right to speak frankly in this matter, because throughout my term as President it has been my constant object to do everything in my power, both by administrative action and by endeavoring to secure legislative action, to advance the cause of labor, protect it from unjust aggression and secure to it its legitimate rights. I have accomplished something; I hope to accomplish more before I leave office; and I have taken special and peculiar interest in Mr. Taft's candidacy because I believe that of all the men in this country he is the man best qualified for continuing the work of securing to the wageworkers of the country their full rights. I will do everything in my power for the wageworkers of the country except to do what is wrong. I will do wrong for no man, and with all the force in my power I solemnly warn the laboring man of this country that any public man who advocates doing wrong in their interests can not be trusted by them; and this whether his promise to do wrong is given knowing that it is wrong or because of a levity and lack of consideration which make him willing to promise anything without counting the cost if thereby support at the moment is to be purchased.

WILL FIGHT ABUSES.

Just as I have fought hard to bring about in the fullest way the recognition of the right of the employee to be amply compensated for injury received in the course of his duty, so I have fought hard and shall continue to fight hard to do away with all abuses in the use of the power of injunction. I will do everything I can to see that the power of injunction is not used to oppress laboring men. I will endeavor to secure them full and equal justice. Therefore in the interest of all good citizens, be they laboring men, business men, professional men, farmers, or members of any other occupation, so long as they have in their souls the principles of sound American citizenship, I denounce as wicked the proposition to secure a law which according to the explicit statement of Mr. Gompers is to prevent the courts from effectively interfering with riotous violence when the object is to destroy a business, and which will legalize a blacklist and the secondary boycott, both of them the apt instruments of unmanly persecution.

But there is another account against Messrs. Bryan and Gompers in this matter. "Ephraim feedeth on wind." Their proposed remedy is an empty sham. They are seeking to delude their followers by the promise of a law which would damage this country solely because of the shown moral purpose that would be shown by putting it upon the statute books, but which would be utterly worthless to accomplish its avowed purpose. I have not the slightest doubt that such a law as that proposed by Mr. Bryan would, if enacted by Congress, be declared unconstitutional by a unanimous Supreme Court—unless indeed Mr. Bryan were able to pack this court with men appointed for the special purpose of declaring such a law constitutional. I happen to know that certain great trust magnates have announced within the past few weeks, in answer to the question as to why they were openly or secretly favoring the election of Mr. Bryan, that the laws that Mr. Bryan proposed, including especially this law, would be wholly ineffective, because the court would undoubtedly throw them out and that the promises to enact them could, therefore, be safely disregarded.

Sincerely, yours, THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

EDITORIAL FROM AMERICAN FEDERATIONIST.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S ATTACK ON LABOR ANSWERED BY SAMUEL GOMPERS.

So President Roosevelt has again thrust himself into the campaign. He not only becomes bitterly partisan, but must needs attempt to throw the weight and influence of his great office in the scales against the interests and equal rights with all other citizens to which the workers of our country aspire and are justly entitled. He makes a direct and specific attack upon labor.

The pretense that the attack is upon me is too thinly veiled to deceive anyone. He strikes over my shoulder at the hearts of the great rank and file of the workers and other liberty-loving citizens of our country.

So far as I am concerned, I have neither the inclination nor the desire to bask in the sunlight of President Roosevelt's "benevolent assimilation," by which he placates some, by the big stick browbeats others, and by his sophistry hopes to fool the masses into supporting Injunction Judge Taft.

President Roosevelt says that Senator Knox has a peculiar right to discuss the principles involved in injunctions, because he as Attorney General prosecuted a civil suit for damages to an injured workman. That Senator Knox was the special counsel of the Pennsylvania Railroad and of the United States Steel Corporation would indeed qualify him to discuss the injunction abuse, but certainly only from the viewpoint of the friends of corporations who profit by the abuse of the injunction writ, as it brings advantage and profit to corporate greed and power.

But does President Roosevelt imagine that the workers of our country will accept his credential to Senator Knox as the spokesman of labor's rights in preference to those whom the great rank and file have themselves chosen as the champions and defenders of their interests and rights? No, indeed. In this contest, knowing the "peculiar" interest which the President manifests in his candidate, will the masses accept even him as the infallible judge of what are the principles of equal rights and liberty for which they contend?

But to consider at this time the subject of Senator Knox is of lesser importance, inasmuch as the President has thrust himself across the path, and I therefore propose to answer his diatribe of abuse and misrepresentation.

If the courts have not invaded human liberty, if they have not undertaken to protect corporate interests to the detriment of the people, why did President Roosevelt characterize Judge Grosscup's reversel of Judge Landis's $29,000,000 fine upon the Standard Oil Trust as "a gross miscarriage of justice"? Why did he, in his special message to Congress January 31, 1908, say:

"It is all wrong to use the injunction to prevent the entirely proper and legitimate actions of labor organizations in their struggle for industrial betterment, or under the guise of protecting property rights unwarrantably to invade the fundamental rights of the individual. It is futile to concede, as we all do, the right and the necessity of organized effort on the part of wage earners and yet by injunctive process to forbid peaceable action to accomplish the lawful objects for which they are organized and upon which their success depends." And further: "If some way of remedying the abuses is not found, the feeling of indignation against them among large numbers of our citizens will tend to grow so extreme as to produce a revolt against the whole use of the process of injunction."

In the same message he says he "considers it most unwise to abolish the use of the process of injunctions." The veriest tyro of a layman, much less one familiar with the injunction process, in his wildest dreams never suggested the abolition of the injunction process. It is not its abolition that labor desires but the restoration to its beneficent use from which it has been ruthlessly diverted; from the protection of property rights to the invasion of personal freedom.

I cite this to show the utter confusion of the entire matter of injunctions in Mr. Roosevelt's mind. In the one message he states a fundamental principle, then makes an absurd deduction, and in his attack on me goes back on it all.

When corporations secure injunctions against workmen with whom they are engaged in a dispute, the injunctions are based upon the theory that the carrying on of their business is a property right; that those workmen (strike breakers) whom they may have secured are necessary to carry on their business and that they have some sort of property right in those strike breakers, and the striking or locked-out workmen are enjoined from interfering, inducing, or persuading the strike breakers from leaving the employment of the corporations on the ground that such interference, inducements, or persuasion is an interference with their property and property rights.

Indeed, in the injunctions sought by the corporations, they further allege, quoting from one, "It is impossible for the plaintiff to obtain workmen, without whose assistance the property of the petitioners becomes utterly valueless for the purpose of their trade." When this claim was considered by the higher courts of Great Britain, all the judges agreed that the lower court had exaggerated its function and jurisdiction in issuing such an injunction.

The decisions of the higher courts of Great Britain were totally disregarded, and the decision of the lower court which was reversed accepted as the basis for the issuance of the injunctions in our country. The injunctions issued by Judge Taft, Judge Ricks, Judge Jackson, Judge Dayton, Judge Gould, and others are based upon the theory that along with the ownership of the mine, factory, workshop, transportation, a certain vested right exists in so much labor or patronage as is needed to make the operation profitable, and that this constitutes a form of property or property right in the laborer.

The relations between employers and employees are personal relations as distinct from property relations; that the rights of either party are personal rights, as distinct from property rights, no intelligent man dare dispute; and yet the courts, in extending their equity power, step in by the injunction process and filch from the toilers, because they are toilers, their rights as citizens and freemen.

Mr. Roosevelt has quoted a portion of the Pearre injunction bill, and I ask any fair-minded citizen to compare it with the provisions of the trades-dispute act passed by the British Parliament less than two years ago. Its main provisions are:

"An act done in pursuance of an agreement or combination by two or more persons shall, if done in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute, not be actionable unless the act, if done without any such agreement or combination, would be actionable.

"It shall be lawful for one or more persons, acting on their own behalf or on behalf of a trade union or of an individual employer or firm in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute, to attend at or near a house or place where a person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be, if they so attend merely for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or abstain from working.

"An act done by a person in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute shall not be actionable on the ground only that it induces some other person to break a contract of employment or that it is an interference with the trade, business, or employment of some other person, or with the right of some other person to dispose of his capital or his labor as he wills.

"An action against a trades-union, whether of workmen or masters, or against any members or officials thereof on behalf of themselves and all other members of the trade union in respect of any tortious act alleged to have been committed by or on behalf of the trade union, shall not be entertained by any court.

"Nothing in this section shall affect the liability of the trustees of a trade union to be sued in the events provided for by the trades-union act, 1871, section 9, except in respect of any tortious act committed by or on behalf of the union in contemplation or in furtherance of a trade dispute."

Surely Mr. Roosevelt would not pretend to say that the monarchy of Great Britain would confer upon the workers the lawful right to exercise "brutal, unfeeling, or despotic power"; and yet the provisions of the Pearre bill and the Wilson bill are not as broad or comprehensive in scope as the British trades-dispute act.

The mere fact that Mr. Roosevelt denounces a proposition as wicked does not so constitute it. Time and circumstances and party obligation have persuaded him to modify his judgment and his utterances. Surely it must bring unction to him to find his unwarranted attack on me so thoroughly appreciated by the New York Sun, which characterizes him for his past utterances in as severe language as that with which he now attacks me. The New York Sun charges him with apostasy to his record and welcomes him into the galaxy of CANNON, Littlefield, Van Cleave, and others of the same sort.

It is the purpose of the opponents of labor to vilify the labor movement through me, and Mr. Roosevelt now joins the chorus upon the pretext that I have attacked the Federal courts. As a man and as a citizen, I have nothing to retract, but I insist that despite great provocation I have always expressed my views and criticism—perhaps in strong, yet respectful, language. If anyone desires to look for criticism and arraignment of the Supreme Court of the United States, let him read the dissenting opinion of Justice Harlan in the Barry Baldwin v. Robert Robertson case. Let him read the opinions of the four dissenting justices when the Supreme Court declared the law limiting the hours of bakers in the State of New York to 10 unconstitutional. Let him read the four dissenting opinions of the Supreme Court's decision when the five justices declared the income tax unconstitutional. No severer indictments were ever expressed by any citizens of our country against the invasions of the people's rights and liberties.

But quite independent of the dissenting justices' opinions and arraignments, it is not amiss to quote the expressions of others equally qualified. Men of highest renown in the legal profession; men whose minds have remained unperverted by the glitter and grind of corporate greed and power; men who stand for justice and who apprehend the dangers to our Republic if personal, discretionary, and arbitrary government is permitted to take the place of government by law.

In October, 1897, Hon. W. H. Moody, now Justice of the United States Supreme Court, said:

"I believe in recent years the courts of the United States, as well as the courts of our own Commonwealth (Massachusetts), have gone to the very verge of danger in applying the process of the writ of injunction in disputes between labor and capital."

Hon. Thomas M. Cooley, president of the American Bar Association, said:

"Courts, with their injunctions, if they heed the fundamental law of the land, can no more hold men to involuntary servitude for even a single hour than can overseers with the whip."

Gov. Pingree, of Michigan, said:

"I consider government by injunction, unless stopped, the beginning of the end of liberty. Tyranny on the bench is as objectionable as tyranny on the throne. It is even more dangerous, because judges claim immunity from criticism, and foolish people acquiesce in their claims."

Judge M. F. Tuley, of the appellate court of Illinois, used these words:

"Such use of injunction by the courts is judicial tyranny, which endangers not only the right of trial by jury but all the rights and liberties of the citizens."

Gov. Sadler, of Nevada, said:

"The tendency at present is to have the courts enforce law by injunction methods, which are subversive of good government and the liberties of the people."

Hon. J. H. Benton, jr., of Massachusetts, said:

"The courts have gone too far. It is impossible for them to go on in the course they have taken and retain the confidence of the people or preserve their own powers. It is idle to say that the popular complaint on this subject means nothing, or that, as one judge has said, 'nobody objects to government by injunction except those who object to any government at all.' It does mean much. It means that the courts have, in the judgment of many of the most intelligent and thoughtful citizens, exceeded their just powers; that they have, by the so-called exercise of the equity power, practically assumed to create and to punish offenses upon trial by themselves without a jury, and with penalties imposed at their discretion. * * * The people will not, and they ought not to, submit to decisions like those in the Northern Pacific and Ann Arbor cases (Taft's injunction)."

Prof. F. J. Stimson, of Harvard, one of the greatest legal authorities, in his new work on "Federal and State Constitutions," after citing many authorities, says:

"These are sufficient to establish the general principle that the injunction process and contempt in chancery procedure, as well as chancery jurisdiction itself, is looked on with a logical jealousy in Anglo-Saxon countries as being in derogation of the common law; * * * taking away the jurisdiction of the common-law courts and depriving the accused of his trial by jury."

Judge John Gibbons, of the circuit court of Illinois, declared that:

"In their efforts to regulate or restrain strikes by injunction, they (the courts) are sowing dragons' teeth and blazing the path of revolution."

In the last edition of his great book, that legal authority, High, "On Injunctions," says:

"Equity has no jurisdiction to restrain the commission of crimes or to enforce moral obligations in the performance of moral duties; nor will it interfere for the prevention of an illegal act merely because it is illegal, and in the absence of any injury to property rights, it will not lend its aid by injunction to restrain the violation of public or penal statutes or the commission of immoral or illegal acts."

I have quoted from these legal celebrities not with the hope of being able to convert the judgment of Mr. Roosevelt, but I have done so simply to conclusively prove to him how "wicked, brutal, and unfeeling" are these jurists and legal authorities. Mr. Roosevelt has placed me in good company.

Might I not recall Jefferson's prophecy, when he said: "It has long been my opinion that the germ of dissolution of our Federal Government is in the constitution of the Federal judiciary, an irresponsible body, working, like gravity, by day and by night, gaining a little to-day and a little to-morrow, and advancing its noiseless step like a thief over the field of jurisdiction until all shall be usurped."

Of course, everyone knows that the President "strongly" urged every measure which he advocated, and then accepted what his political opponents in his own party chose to give him. It is general knowledge that he had a more liberal platform prepared for adoption by the Republican convention at Chicago and then accepted what they doled out. All know that the nomination of Mr. SHERMAN for the Vice Presidency was concocted by Senator Burrows and "Genial Uncle JOE" CANNON as a slap in the face to Mr. Roosevelt; but the President, because his injunction judge, Mr. Taft, has been nominated for the Presidency, now not only swallows the whole pot pourri, but must needs directly and indirectly attack me in the fight which my fellow workers and I are making in defense of equality before the law of the men of labor with all other citizens and for the establishment of human freedom.

Pray, what has transpired to have induced the President to change from a position of, at least, apparent friendship to bitter, indefensible antagonism? The Pearre injunction bill, which Mr. Roosevelt attacks, has been before several Congresses without a word of criticism or comment from him.

It has been my pleasure to have often had the privilege of discussing with President Roosevelt a number of the fundamental questions of right, justice, and moral and social uplift. Included in these discussions were the invasions of personal rights and human liberty by the courts in the injunction abuse. It is true that the President has not always fully agreed with my contentions, but he has never until the publication of his latest utterance hinted, much less charged, that anything which I advocated was lawless, unfeeling, despotic, brutal, or wicked; and yet the rights for which the workers of our country contend and which, as best I can, I defend and advocate have been as well known to him during the past several years as they are when he now so unjustifiedly undertakes to misrepresent my work, my motives, and my law-abiding citizenship. Surely that opinion was not always entertained by the President, as the following will show:

In the February, 1908, issue of the American Federationist I published the chapter "Some Equivocal Rights of Labor," from Hon. George A. Alger's book, "Moral Overstrain." The chapter of the book is as keen criticism of the courts of the country in their decisions affecting the rights, interests, and liberty of the workers as anything I have ever said or written. I quote this one brief paragraph of Mr. Alger's article:

"Stated as concretely as possible, the principal difference between the working people and the courts lies in the marked tendency of the courts to guarantee to the workman an academic and theoretic liberty, which he does not want, by denying him industrial rights, to which he thinks he is ethically entitled. His grievance is that in a multiplicity of instances the courts give what seems to him counterfeit liberty in the place of its reality."

Just before publishing that article I sent the following letter to the President:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 25, 1908.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am greatly indebted to you for calling to my attention the chapter entitled "Some Equivocal Rights of Labor" in George A. Alger's "Moral Overstrain." I was so much impressed with it that I requested and secured permission from the publishers to republish this chapter in the American Federationist. It appears in the February issue, and I am taking the liberty of sending you herewith a copy of that issue, which you will please accept with my assurances of high regard.

Very sincerely, yours,

SAMUEL GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

To THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States.

To which I received the following reply:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 27, 1908.

MY DEAR MR. GOMPERS: You may be amused to know that I have sent copies of the "Moral Overstrain" to Justices Day and McKenna. I am glad that you were able to use it in the American Federationist, and thank you for sending me the copy of the magazine.

Sincerely, yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

To Mr. SAMUEL GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor, Washington, D. C.

President Roosevelt quotes a statement made by the Hon. T. C. Spelling before the Judiciary Committee of the House. Without expressing an opinion at all up the quotation, it may not be uninteresting to call attention to the fact, without disrespect to Mr. Spelling, that he is not an attorney for the Federation now, and that very soon after his utterance, which President Roosevelt quotes, he was appointed as an expert for the Interstate Commerce Commission and later appointed in the Department of Justice; that a day or so after his latest appointment Attorney General Bonaparte gave out a statement to the press that he had appointed an expert on the law of corporations, and Mr. Spelling proudly showed me the interview.

Surely Mr. Roosevelt does "Mr. Mitchell and other labor leaders" an injustice when he say that they differ from me in the matter of the Pearre and the Wilson bills or the principles upon which they are based. Mr. John Mitchell, Mr. Frank Morrison, and I are now on trial to show cause why we should not be sent to jail because we exercised our constitutional rights, having violated no law of State or Nation. Will the President publicly justify Justice Gould's injunction and the contempt proceedings to send Mitchell, Morrison, and me to jail on the grounds for contempt which are put forward by the Buck's Stove & Range Co. under that injunction? The injunction issued by Justice Gould is based upon injunctions issued by Judge Taft, and Judge Taft's language is quoted by Justice Gould.

The fact of the matter is that President Roosevelt, having made Injunction Judge Taft the candidate of the Republican Party for President, and seeing that the "labor vote," which so often has been corralled, diverted, and perverted by the politicians, is now aroused and determined to deliver its own vote, that the toilers will not be cajoled, deceived, or browbeaten, has become desperate and angry, and in his anger, by the worst exhibition of demagogism, tries to instill into the employers and business men the fear that their property and business are in danger if a "square deal," implied by equality before the law and human freedom, are accorded to the workers with all other citizens. It is an exhibition of impotent rage and disappointment and an awful descent from the dignity of the high office of the President of the United States. No one but himself will be deceived as to the purpose of Mr. Roosevelt.

The workers and liberty-loving citizens are aroused as never before since 1861. The "Battle Cry for Freedom" is again taken up. Then it was for the Union and the abolition of black slavery; to-day it is for the Union, equal rights and freedom for all.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON] has undertaken to show that this measure is unconstitutional, because it is an invasion by the legislative branch of the Government with the inherent rights of the judiciary, which, he asserts, is a coordinate branch of the Government.

The judicial branch of our Government has no inherent rights. The only rights which it has are those specifically granted by the Constitution, or necessarily implied in such grants. Even in the determining of those questions the legislative branch of the Government was made supreme by the Constitution itself whenever it sees fit to exercise that supremacy. That fact becomes obvious when you realize that the power of impeachment was placed in the hands of Congress with no power placed anywhere to review or reverse its decisions.

An equal branch does not have power and jurisdiction over an equal branch of the Government. The superior branch of the Government has power and jurisdiction over the inferior branch, and the very fact that the power to impeach was placed in the hands of the legislative branch of the Government makes the legislative branch of the Government supreme.

With regard to the constitutionality of this measure, which has been attacked, I wish to say this: That, in my judgment, Congress has the power to define the jurisdiction of all courts on all questions which may come before the courts, except in so far as jurisdiction has been specifically granted by the Constitution itself; that on all other questions of jurisdiction the Congress has the power to determine and, by the impeachment process, to which I have just referred, the power to enforce its determination as to what the jurisdiction shall be. It has exercised that power on many occasions. It has created courts and given to those courts certain jurisdiction, and no jurisdiction beyond that which was specifically stated in the law creating the court.

If the contention be correct that the power of our judiciary extends to all cases in law and equity and the legislative branch of the Government can not change that condition, then the moment you create a Court of Claims or the moment you create a Commerce Court or the moment you create any other court that court would have entire jurisdiction in law and equity, and there would be no power on the part of Congress to limit the jurisdiction. But Congress has exercised the power of limiting the jurisdiction of courts, and, so far as I am aware or have been informed, there has been no power that has undertaken to say that Congress has not the right to determine what the jurisdiction of the courts it created should be. Now, if it has that power with the creation of a Court of Claims or a Commerce Court or any similar court, it has the same power with regard to our equity courts, and has the right to determine what their jurisdiction shall be and to what matters their jurisdiction shall extend. It has the right to say that their jurisdiction shall extend to certain things and shall not extend to certain other things, and, among others, it has the right to say that it shall not extend to the issuance of injunctions under certain terms and conditions.

It is asserted in circulars that have been sent to every Member of this House, and by Members in this House, that this bill undertakes to legalize the boycott; that it undertakes to legalize picketing, and because it undertakes to do that they are opposed to the measure.

This bill does not legalize the boycott or picketing. It does not deal with the question of the legality of either of them. What it does do is to prevent the equity court from stepping in in a case of peaceful picketing, or stepping in in the case of a boycott, and by the writ of injunction undertaking to adjudicate it. There has been a great deal of criticism of the use of the right to boycott by workmen in their trade disputes, and for that reason some men are opposed to a proposition that prevents the equity court from stepping in with the writ of injunction to prevent a boycott.

But, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to this House now that the boycott itself lies at the very foundation of our moral code, and if you take away the boycott, if you wipe out the boycott, your moral code itself falls. One of the first things that we teach our children, one of the first things that we were taught ourselves, is to shun evildoers; avoid evil communications; boycott those who are bad. There is no inherent wrong in the boycott. On the contrary, it is generally good; but there may be cases in which the boycott is wrong. There may be cases under which the boycott would work an injustice on some one, and if there are such circumstances they should be specified in the law and the law courts should deal with the violation of them and not the equity courts. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, that there are stranger things than are dreamed of in your philosophy, gentlemen, was illustrated in the House of Representatives to-day, when, during the debate on the pending anti-injunction bill, the Speaker's chair was temporarily occupied by a Member whose service in the ranks of labor was terminated by a Federal injunction, and not only that, but by the most noted of the injunctions which served to make government by injunction an issue in this country, and resulting in the pending legislation. I refer to the Debs injunction.

I want to congratulate the workingmen of the United States upon the fact that after 20 years of agitation the Congress of the United States is to-day taking the first open practical step to settle the issue of government by injunction by throwing about this kingly judicial power certain safeguards and forbidding its use against certain acts which will lead to its disuse in labor controversies. When injunctions are not so readily issued they will not be so readily asked for.

The same thing will be true of the contempt bill, reported favorably by the Committee on the Judiciary, providing for trials by jury in cases of constructive contempt. There will not be so many such contempts.

I want also to congratulate the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives and the Democratic Party upon the courage, the honesty, and the promptness with which its official representatives at their first opportunity have redeemed this pledge made by the Democratic Party to the toilers of the Nation in its national platform 16 years ago, and which it has repeated in every national platform since that time, the platform of 1908 containing the following declaration upon the subject of labor and injunctions:

LABOR AND INJUNCTIONS—DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM.

Experience has proven the necessity of a modification of the present law relating to injunctions, and we reiterate the pledge of our national platform of 1896 and 1904 in favor of the measure which passed the United States Senate in 1896, but which a Republican Congress has ever since refused to enact, relating to contempts in Federal courts and providing for trial by jury in cases of indirect contempt.

Questions of judicial practice have arisen, especially in connection with industrial disputes. We believe that the parties to all judicial proceedings should be treated with rigid impartiality, and that injunctions should not be issued in any cases in which injunctions would not issue if no industrial dispute were involved.

A more faithful compliance with a platform pledge in both letter and spirit will hardly be afforded by the annals of Congress than the bill under consideration measured by the above declaration. It is true that the bill is not all that some of us would like and that some of us would ask, but it is more than many would give and, as one who has had bitter practical experience in the matter of government by injunction, I shall be well pleased and shall consider it a field day for the workingmen of America when so good and fair a measure as the pending bill finds its way upon the statute books of the United States.

NECESSITY FOR INJUNCTION LEGISLATION.

Mr. Speaker, in this debate some eloquent eulogies have been passed upon the courts of this country. It is not my purpose to place in the record of this debate a single sentence that would abate one jot or tittle of respect for the courts or obedience to the law and its orderly processes. When the question of my own obedience to the process of the courts was put to the judicial test and that, too, by the court out of which it issued, it is one of the proud and lasting recollections of my life that it was decided, even in a time of great public excitement, when the scales of justice, held in the hands of a single man, might well have tipped the other way and have placed an indelible stain upon my name as a law-abiding American citizen—it is, I say, my proud and grateful recollection, under these circumstances, that I, young in years, immature in judgment, and surrounded by conditions of great provocation and excitement, had yielded clear and absolute obedience to the law, and not only to the law, but to the orders of the court, which were based upon false and ex parte affidavits and issued without notice or a day in court to those whose rights as American citizens, whose liberties, whose future good name and welfare were to be thus imperiled.

But others, I am sorry to say, equally deserving, were not equally fortunate, and I could recite individual instances of gross injustices, which, after the lapse of 18 years, I can hardly recall with composure. Gentlemen opposing this legislation have said on the floor and have said in their report that not a single instance of "too ready issuance of injunctions"—I quote from the minority report—"not a single case upon which the opinion of the majority could be founded."

It was pointed out in reply by majority members of the committee that the books were full of cases. But there are cases not to be found in books. There are cases of these abuses to be found in human lives in every community throughout the United States; cases which led to a nation-wide agitation for reform in the issuance and use of injunctions in labor disputes; cases which made the abuse of the writ of injunction an issue in national politics, earning for it the significant name of "government by injunction," and of which both great political parties had to take cognizance, and one of which, the Republican Party, throughout its entire 16 years of undisputed control of the National Government in all its departments refused to frame or report or in any manner act upon any measure whatsoever to remedy the evil. And yet to-day, when the other great party, the Democratic Party, seizes upon this, its first opportunity to redeem the pledges it has been making during these 16 years of Republican inactivity, we find the reactionary leaders of the Republican Party which during its long period of power had throttled and suppressed this and other measures looking to the welfare of the workingmen of America deserted by their own following, so that out of their membership of 162 in this body they are able to muster but a pitiful handful in opposition to this bill. Only 31 Republicans and no Democrats voted against the bill on final passage.

Apparently the minority members of the Judiciary Committee, six out of seven of which signed the minority report against the bill, not only do not represent their own party sentiment on this question, but are too shortsighted to see their own inconsistencies.

The standpat leaders, like voices from the tombs, some of them just fresh from repudiation at the hands of their own party in the primaries, stand upon the floor of the House denouncing this measure as the death knell of the courts and constitutional government as though they really represented anybody but themselves.

GROSS INCONSISTENCY OF MINORITY MEMBERS.

After saying that the majority did not produce a single instance of abuse of the injunctive power, and I quote the language of the report as follows:

According to the report of the majority of this committee, this bill intends to correct "the too ready issuance of injunctions, or the issuance without proper precautions or safeguards." If the report is predicated upon the "too ready issuance of injunctions," it is singular that it does not disclose a single case upon which the opinion of the majority could be founded. We are well aware of the charges iterated and reiterated before congressional committees alleging abuses in the issuance of injunctions. We have not found any more evidence to support them in the past than we now find in the report of the committee.

They admitted in the following paragraph their willingness to correct the abuse which they say does not exist in the following language:

The minority Members have at all times been willing to assent to a rational proposal to further safeguard the issuance of injunctions against even the possibility of abuse, and have introduced a bill for that purpose.

That is to say there is no known case of abuse of the writ of injunction; but because of the possibility that such a case may arise in the future the minority have introduced a bill to safeguard against even this conjectural danger. As this same minority was a majority in the last Congress and did not undertake to report any such bill, it must follow that even the conjectural possibility of abuse referred to in their report must be of very recent origin, so recent, possibly, as their overwhelming repudiation at the polls in the last national election for the gross betrayal of this and other pledges made by their party to the American people.

Another inconsistency in the minority report is its reliance upon the English practice in support of its contention that the courts should retain the power to issue temporary restraining orders without notice. It may be remarked in passing that the principal difference between temporary restraining orders and preliminary injunctions is a mere jugglery of terms. Indeed, in practical effect, and so far as results frequently are concerned, permanent injunctions might be added to the list. It has been well said by members of the majority in debate, and it was expressed with singular felicity by the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS], that frequently the issuance of a temporary restraining order determined the entire issue in favor of the employer. In other words, the issuance of the temporary restraining order was in itself sufficient to break the back of the strike. American workingmen are inherently law-abiding. They fear and respect the power of the courts, and once that power is invoked against them dismay seizes upon their ranks and the weaker of them invariably capitulate, to the undoing of the stronger of them. The man who does not know this does not know enough about the life and the conditions of labor to legislate upon the subject.

NO GOVERNMENT BY INJUNCTION IN ENGLAND—ENGLISH LAWS.

But while gentlemen of the minority rely upon the English practice of issuing temporary restraining orders without notice or hearing, they repudiate the acts of the British Parliament exempting organizations of labor from the English conspiracy laws; and when it is pointed out to them that the provisions of the pending bill which they consider the most objectionable were taken bodily from the statutes of England, they reply that while this is true, yet, to use their own language—

The peculiar privileges conferred upon trades-unions by the English act of 1906 are accompanied by disabilities and criminal provisions of so drastic a nature that if they were offered as any part of the legislation of this country we should deem it our duty to oppose them in the interest of all workingmen.

It may be noted, however, that while the leaders of organized labor in the United States have been convicted and sentenced to terms of imprisonment for alleged violations of the writ of injunction, the leaders of organized labor in England have not similarly suffered either under English judicial processes built up by the courts—court-made law or by English statutes.

It may be noted, too, that government by injunction is not and never has been an issue in England, although England is almost purely an industrial nation.

I shall insert at the end of my remarks not only the English act of 1906 just refered to, but the two acts of which it is amendatory, to wit, the trade-union act of 1871 and the trade-union act amendment of 1876. The three acts follow in the order of time.

I shall not discuss them except to point out that by sections 2 and 3 and succeeding provisions of the act of 1871 trades-unions were specifically exempted from the conspiracy laws, so that for the past 41 years members of trades-unions in England could not be criminally prosecuted for the very acts for which Samuel Gompers, Frank Morrison, and John Mitchell have been sentenced to pay heavy fines and suffer long terms of imprisonment, and could not be sued civilly and mulcted in treble damages as in the case of the Danbury hatters, whose very homes have been levied upon to pay the damages secured against them in that proceeding, the legality of which has been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States as within the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law.

SHERMAN ANTITRUST LAW A FAILURE.

The Sherman antitrust law was enacted to protect labor from the unjust exactions of capital, but thus far it has only succeeded in protecting capital from the just demands of labor.

No "captain of industry," no "malefactor of great wealth," no representative of the "predatory interests" has yet had to appear before the Supreme Court of the United States to defend himself against a sentence of imprisonment for violating the Sherman antitrust law; no corporation has had to appear before the Supreme Court of the United States to defend itself against a judgment for treble damages.

Labor has had to do both of these things. These facts are significant. These facts throw light upon the agitation for judicial reform in this country.

Section 1 of the amendment of 1906 declares that—an act done in pursuance of an agreement or combination by two or more persons shall, if done in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute, not be actionable unless the act, if done without any such agreement or combination, would be actionable—

Which is substantially the same as the declaration in the Democratic national platform of 1908 that—injunctions should not be issued in any cases in which injunctions would not issue if no industrial dispute were involved.

The meaning of these provisions is the same.

ACTS WHICH CAN NOT BE ENJOINED.

Certain acts may not be enjoined at all, and in order that these acts may be clearly exhibited to the students of this debate they are succinctly stated as follows:

No restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from doing any of the following acts, to wit:

1. Terminating any relation of employment.
2. Ceasing to perform any work or labor.
3. Recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do.
4. Attending at or near a house or place where any person resides, or works, or carries on business, or happens to be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information.
5. Peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working.
6. Ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute.
7. Recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do.
8. Paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value.
9. Peacefully assembling at any place in a lawful manner and for lawful purposes.
10. Doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto.

The last of the 10 classes of acts above enumerated really embraces all the others, and the entire series only particularize the somewhat more general provisions of the English amendment of 1906, and which itself only particularizes the provisions of the original English trades-unions law.

Speaking of the foregoing provision the Republican members of the Judiciary Committee, on page 7 of their report, say:

The paragraph contains to our mind the most vicious proposal of the whole bill.

"CLASS" LEGISLATION.

The pending bill is characterized in the minority report as—impracticable, invalid, in the interests of a class rather than of the community, and proposes standards of legality without parallel or precedent in our legislation.

I have already alluded to the eulogies which these same gentlemen, who denounce the pending bill as "class" legislation, have heaped upon the courts. Singularly enough, but consistently enough, their speeches will be found devoid of like effusions upon the "class" referred to in the foregoing quotation from their report. I have affirmed, and I want to repeat my own adherence to the law and obedience to the orders of the courts, even when I believe them to be wrong; but I submit, in opposition to the views of gentlemen, that the courts are not the bulwark of our institutions nor the sheet anchor of our liberties, and neither is the Congress nor any other department of this Government; but that the sole hope of the perpetuity and the welfare of this country in the final analysis is the intelligence, the patriotism, and the prosperity of the so-called "class" referred to in the minority report:

Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates and men decay.
Princes and lords may flourish or may fade—
A breath can make them, as a breath has made;
But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
When once destroy'd can never be supplied.

The hope of this country and its institutions is the preservation of the conditions which enable men from the ranks to rise to the highest positions in politics, in finance, in industry; the maintenance of a homogeneous democracy that will enable the boy at the plow and at the shovel to become the man upon the bench and in the forum and in all the high places of the country. Given this condition, all other things will be added.

The pending bill is an act—a very small act—looking to the preservation of this condition. Already the abuse of the writ of injunction and the consequent disfavor into which it has fallen has in a measure abated the use of it, and to that extent abated the necessity for this legislation. The workers, through their organizations, have in some measure already achieved an appreciable start toward emancipation from government by injunction, just as they have already established the eight-hour day for vastly greater numbers than have ever received the benefits of that great reform at the hands of Government, and just as, through organized effort, they have achieved many other great reforms and brought about many other safeguards and conditions of labor calculated to uplift and benefit and humanize not only themselves but, because of the vastness of their numbers and their basic position in society, all humanity.

But while it is true that labor through organization has blazed the way for these reforms and in a measure abated the benefit, if not the necessity, of legislative action, it is well that the lawmaking power should safeguard, in the manner proposed in this bill, the rights of the wage earners to organize and, in the furtherance of their efforts to better their condition, to do in a peaceful and orderly manner as members of such organization the things which they might do as individuals. This is all the pending measure seeks to accomplish, and nothing less should be offered or accepted.

ORGANIZED LABOR—ITS BENEFITS.

Nowadays when a man becomes eminent he is honored with a degree in some great institutions of learning. If he becomes preeminent, he is honored with another degree—honorary membership in a labor organization. Having never attained eminence, I have not been honored with the first degree, and, as for the second, I take great pride in the fact that my union card was earned in the ranks of labor. And when I cease to take pride in that fact, and when I cease to feel the deepest and most heartfelt interest in the great cause of humanity which it represents, I shall no longer be worthy of my own respect, to say nothing of the respect of my fellow men.

Organization is not only a benefit, but is the greatest single agency in the uplift of labor. I shall mention only a few of its more important benefits, not as I have learned of them from the lips or pens of others, but as I have learned them in actual experience.

Organized labor is first of all promotive of the brotherhood of man, giving the wage-earner an identity, a sense of unity with his fellow man; a sense, I may say, of keepership of his brother that would be impossible under a condition where it was every fellow for himself, the devil take the hindmost.

It increases the efficiency and competency of labor. Each trade has its journal of craft instruction. These journals are, in fact, correspondence schools, giving the trades-unionist the theory and technique of his practical work, inculcating pride in his calling and urging him to self-study and improvement.

It makes better men of its membership, appealing to the best that is in them, developing character and raising their mental, moral, and physical standard. It makes for better citizenship, and good citizenship is the best and most enduring asset, the highest product, of any country.

Membership in a labor organization is a certificate of reliability as well as of competency. It is a well-known fact that many employers in the better organized crafts prefer union to nonunion labor. This may not grow out of any great love for organization, but the up-to-date employer knows that the chances are there is something wrong with the man who is not a member, and that somewhere in his make-up or in his record there is a weak spot that will put him beyond the pale of the confidence of the employer as it has put him beyond the pale of affiliation with his fellow workmen.

Nor are the benefits of organization confined to its immediate membership. As the rain falls alike on the just and the unjust so the standard of wages and conditions of labor accruing to organized effort indirectly benefit the unorganized. All values are relative, and it would be manifestly impossible to confine the beneficial results of the better conditions created by organization to its membership, just as impossible as it would be to confer all the benefits of a law of the land upon those who favored its enactment to the exclusion of those who opposed it or took no interest in it.

Nor are the benefits of organization confined to the wage-earners, whether within or without its folds. It is the greatest single factor to-day in giving stability to industrial conditions, thereby promoting peace and prosperity in the commerce and industry of the country. There may be those superficial enough to think that if there were no unions and no union contracts with employers there would be no industrial strife or trouble. Well, maybe there would not. Suppose we call it anarchy, such as was witnessed recently in the unorganized Pittsburgh district of Pennsylvania, and let it go at that.

Nor are the benefits of organization confined to employer and employee. Its beneficial activities reach out beyond these and to-day embrace the entire social and economic life of the people of this country. No civic movement to-day counts itself in battle formation and ready for the charge until the sturdy battalions of labor have fallen into line, and no movement for the betterment of humanity appeals to it in vain. Like all other human institutions, it has made its mistakes and has engaged in foolish crusades, but its mistakes have been of the head and not of the heart and have sprung from an excess of zeal in causes it believed to be right and not with any consciousness of wrong.

But organization is not only a benefit to labor; it is a necessity. Labor owes much to the form of government and political institutions under which we live, and it owes much to the rapid development and exploitation of that vast storehouse of natural wealth embraced within the boundary lines of the United States, but these are blessings and advantages enjoyed by all; and even under these conditions, to be found in no other nation and in no other age, the battle for bread, for a living wage, has become so fierce that the elective franchise and the bounties of nature combined have not sufficed to insure the workman his hire. Under modern industrial conditions, with their great combinations of capital, organization is the only practical method of dealing with the employer and is the strongest barrier between labor and serfdom; and that it is a fixed and lawful institution, both beneficial and necessary, is no longer open to question in the minds of reasonable and progressive men.

But with recognition of the right of labor to organize to secure better pay and conditions of life, even by that last source of recognition, the courts, there is still a strong tendency upon the part of the courts, and particularly the Federal courts, to restrict and deny the peaceful and orderly means by which these ends may be attained, and to deny them in ways so vital as to involve a denial of the dearest constitutional rights of American citizenship.

And while this condition is permitted to exist the entire structure of organized labor is in peril. Recently this country was shocked by the sentence of fine and imprisonment imposed upon Samuel Gompers, John Mitchell, and Frank Morrison, the official heads of the American Federation of Labor.

This sentence was imposed upon them for having violated the most arbitrary and outrageous order of court perhaps ever issued in this country; an order so sweeping as to forbid every member of that organization to even mention by word or pen the name of the Buck Stove & Range Co., the president of which, Mr. James Van Cleave, was, at the same time, the president of an organization which had for its primary object the destruction of the American Federation of Labor and, for that matter, all other labor unions. So radical and sweeping was the decision in which sentence was imposed for the alleged violation of this injunction, and so shockingly intemperate and manifestly prejudiced the utterances and manner of the judge, that it was set aside by the Supreme Court of the United States and will probably never be carried into effect.

But after four years of expensive and harrassing prosecution, the case is still hanging fire in the Federal courts of the District of Columbia, and the fate of the defendants, which involves the very life of organized labor in this country is still hanging fire, and the law under which these prosecutions were laid is still upon the statute books, a threat and a menace to the intelligent, patriotic, and law-abiding workingmen of America, and to the most priceless rights of American citizenship, including the rights of free speech, a free press, and trial by jury.

THE SHERMAN ANTITRUST LAW.

The right of the court to issue such an injunction, the right to enjoin the acts complained of, and not the guilt or innocence of the defendants, is the question of paramount importance to the workingmen of America.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in what is known as the Danbury Hatters case, on February 3, 1908, by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, in an action brought by Loewe & Co., hat manufacturers of Danbury, Conn., under the Sherman antitrust law, claiming three-fold damages for injuries growing out of a peaceful labor dispute, declared the labor organization involved, the United Hatters of North America, which was affiliated with the American Federation of Labor—

> A combination in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, in the sense in which those words are used in the (Sherman) act, and the action can be maintained accordingly.

The Supreme Court further said that its—

> Conclusion rests on many judgments of this court, to the effect that the act prohibits any combination whatever to secure action which essentially obstructs the free flow of commerce between the States or restricts in that regard the liberty of a trader to engage in business.

Under this decision, if the employees, in furtherance of their cause, advise persons not to purchase the employer's product, a thing they might do with impunity were no strike pending, they will be liable to treble damages; and if a court issues an injunction forbidding them to advise persons to purchase the employer's product and they violate this injunction, they are guilty of a crime for which, without trial by jury, they may be tried by the judge issuing the order and sent to prison. And yet some people persist in calling this a free and civilized country.

LABOR PATIENTLY ENDURES JUDICIAL OUTRAGES.

In Colorado a district judge tried in a few hours 15 striking coal miners and sentenced them all to one year's imprisonment for violating a strike injunction. It was shown afterwards that some of these men were innocent beyond question. Had they been charged with the violation of the criminal statutes of the State, they could have demanded and received separate trials, by jury; as they were charged with contempt of court, they were herded before the judge who issued the order, and with hardly a semblance of trial condemned to one year's imprisonment each. The highest testimonial I could pay to the law-abiding and law-loving character of the American workingman would be merely to point to the fact that he suffers such outrageous travesties upon justice to be perpetrated upon him. It is only highly civilized and law-loving men who would patiently endure such damnable outrages and violations of their natural and inherent rights as citizens of a free country.

When employers may send their attorneys into court and get weak and venal judges to serve their purposes in this manner, what inducement, or what necessity, is there for employers to treat with their employees? The fact is, the too ready issuance of injunctions in labor disputes puts a premium upon the creation of such disputes.

In the partial remedying of this unjust condition we are, as I have already stated, blazing no new trail in the world of industry, but only following haltingly in the footsteps of England, as we have done in the case of our employers' liability laws, and full justice will not be done until labor organizations are completely exempted in this country, as they are in England, from the operation of the monopoly and conspiracy laws.

MISSION OF ORGANIZED LABOR.

It is the mission of organized labor to be the principal factor in bringing about the full and complete emancipation of labor from the antiquated laws which originated in a primitive condition of society when the wage-earner partook more of the status of a serf than of a freeman. There are those who take the pessimistic view that organized labor has passed the zenith of its usefulness, that it is incapable of playing a further great and useful part in working out the destiny of the people, and that it should now be discarded for some much more radical and political movement. I want to dissent from that view and to affirm the proposition that with the teeming issues of a practical character which are pressing for solution, the pending injunction bill, the contempt bill, the eight-hour law, workmen's compensation, mediation, conciliation, and arbitration of labor disputes, and many other beneficial and humane reforms—I want, I say, with all these issues pressing, to affirm the proposition that instead of having passed or even reached the zenith of its usefulness, this great power for good is only in its infancy. Its fate is in its own hands. May it continue worthy to play a great and good part in making this a better and a kindlier world in which to live.

(4) Where a trade-union applying to be registered has been in operation for more than a year before the date of such application, there shall be delivered to the registrar before the registry thereof a general statement of the receipts, funds, effects, and expenditure of such trade-union in the same form, and showing the same particulars, as if it were the annual general statement required as hereinafter mentioned to be transmitted annually to the registrar.

17. The registrars of the friendly societies in England, Scotland, and Ireland shall be the registrars under this act.

The registrar shall lay before Parliament annual reports with respect to the matters transacted by such registrars in pursuance of this act.

ENGLISH TRADE-UNION ACT AMENDMENT, 1876.

CHAP. 22. An act to amend the trade-union act, 1871. (30th June, 1876.)

Whereas it is expedient to amend the trade-union act, 1871: Be it therefore

Enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. This act and the trade-union act, 1871, hereinafter termed the principal act, shall be construed as one act, and may be cited together as the "trade-union acts, 1871 and 1876," and this act may be cited separately as the "trade-union act amendment act, 1876."

2. Notwithstanding anything in section 5 of the principal act contained, a trade-union, whether registered or unregistered, which insures or pays money on the death of a child under 10 years of age, shall be deemed to be within the provisions of section 28 of the friendly societies act, 1875.

3. Whereas by section 8 of the principal act it is enacted that "the real or personal estate of any branch of a trade-union shall be vested in the trustees of such branch," the said section shall be read and construed as if immediately after the hereinbefore-recited words there were inserted the words "or of the trustees of the trade-union, if the rules of the trade-union so provide."

4. When any person, being or having been a trustee of a trade-union or of any branch of a trade-union, and whether appointed before or after the legal establishment thereof, in whose name any stock belonging to such union or branch transferable at the Bank of England or Bank of Ireland is standing, either jointly with another or others or solely, is absent from Great Britain or Ireland, respectively, or becomes bankrupt, or files any petition, or executes any deed for liquidation of his affairs by assignment or arrangement, or for composition with his creditors, or becomes a lunatic, or is dead, or has been removed from his office of trustee, or if it be unknown whether such person is living or dead, the registrar, on application in writing from the secretary and three members of the union or branch, and on proof satisfactory to him, may direct the transfer of the stock into the names of any other persons as trustees for the union or branch; and such transfer shall be made by the surviving or continuing trustees, and if there be no such trustee, or if such trustees refuse or be unable to make such transfer, and the registrar so direct, then by the accountant general or deputy or assistant accountant general of the Bank of England or Bank of Ireland, as the case may be; and the governors and companies of the Bank of England and Bank of Ireland, respectively, are hereby indemnified for anything done by them or any of their officers in pursuance of this provision against any claim or demand of any person injuriously affected thereby.

5. The jurisdiction conferred in the case of certain offenses by section 12 of the principal act upon the court of summary jurisdiction for the place in which the registered office of a trade-union is situate may be exercised either by that court or by the court of summary jurisdiction for the place where the offense has been committed.

6. Trade-unions carrying or intending to carry on business in more than one country shall be registered in the country in which their registered office is situate; but copies of the rules of such unions, and of all amendments of the same, shall, when registered, be sent to the registrar of each of the other countries to be recorded by him, and until such rules be so recorded the union shall not be entitled to any of the privileges of this act or the principal act in the country in which such rules have not been recorded, and until such amendments of rules be recorded the same shall not take effect in such country.

In this section "country" means England, Scotland, or Ireland.

7. Whereas by the "life assurance companies act, 1870," it is provided that the said act shall not apply to societies registered under the acts relating to friendly societies: The said act (or the amending acts) shall not apply nor be deemed to have applied to trade-unions registered or to be registered under the principal act.

8. No certificate of registration of a trade-union shall be withdrawn or canceled otherwise than by the chief registrar of friendly societies, or in the case of trade-unions registered and doing business exclusively in Scotland or Ireland, by the assistant registrar for Scotland or Ireland, and in the following cases:

(1) At the request of the trade-union to be evidenced in such manner as such chief or assistant registrar shall from time to time direct.

(2) On proof to his satisfaction that a certificate of registration has been obtained by fraud or mistake, or that the registration of the trade-union has become void under section 6 of the trade-union act, 1871, or that such trade-union has willfully and after notice from a registrar, whom it may concern, violated any of the provisions of the trade-union acts, or has ceased to exist.

Not less than two months' previous notice in writing, specifying briefly the ground of any proposal, withdrawal, or canceling of certificate—unless where the same is shown to have become void as aforesaid, in which case it shall be the duty of the chief or assistant registrar to cancel the same forthwith—shall be given by the chief or assistant registrar to a trade-union before the certificate of registration of the same can be withdrawn or canceled, except at its request.

A trade-union whose certificate of registration has been withdrawn or canceled shall, from the time of such withdrawal or canceling, absolutely cease to enjoy as such the privileges of a registered trade-union, but without prejudice to any liability actually incurred by such trade-union, which may be enforced against the same as if such withdrawal or canceling had not taken place.

9. A person under the age of 21, but above the age of 16, may be a member of a trade-union, unless provision be made in the rules thereof to the contrary, and may, subject to the rules of the trade-union, enjoy all the rights of a member except as herein provided, and execute all instruments and give all acquittances necessary to be executed or given under the rules, but shall not be a member of the committee of management, trustee, or treasurer of the trade-union.

10. A member of a trade-union not being under the age of 16 years may, by writing under his hand, delivered at, or sent to, the registered office of the trade-union, nominate any person not being an officer or servant of the trade-union (unless such officer or servant is the husband, wife, father, mother, child, brother, sister, nephew, or niece of the nominator), to whom any moneys payable on the death of such member not exceeding £50 shall be paid at his decease, and may from time to time revoke or vary such nomination by writing under his hand similarly delivered or sent; and on receiving satisfactory proof of the death of a nominator the trade-union shall pay to the nominee the amount due to the deceased member not exceeding the sum aforesaid.

11. A trade-union may, with the approval in writing of the chief registrar of friendly societies, or in the case of trade-unions registered and doing business exclusively in Scotland or Ireland, of the assistant registrar for Scotland or Ireland, respectively, change its name by the consent of not less than two-thirds of the total number of members.

No change of name shall affect any right or obligation of the trade-union or of any member thereof, and any pending legal proceedings may be continued by or against the trustees of the trade-union or any other officer who may sue or be sued on behalf of such trade-union, notwithstanding its new name.

12. Any two or more trade-unions may, by the consent of not less than two-thirds of the members of each or every such trade-union, become amalgamated together as one trade-union, with or without any dissolution or division of the funds of such trade-unions, or either or any of them; but no amalgamation shall prejudice any right of a creditor of either or any union party thereto.

13. Notice in writing of every change of name or amalgamation signed, in the case of a change of name, by seven members, and countersigned by the secretary of the trade-union changing its name, and accompanied by a statutory declaration by such secretary that the provisions of this act in respect of changes of name have been complied with, and in the case of an amalgamation signed by seven members, and countersigned by the secretary of each or every union party thereto, and accompanied by a statutory declaration by each or every such secretary that the provisions of this act in respect of amalgamations have been complied with, shall be sent to the central office established by the friendly societies act, 1875, and registered there, and until such change of name or amalgamation is so registered the same shall not take effect.

14. The rules of every trade-union shall provide for the manner of dissolving the same, and notice of every dissolution of a trade-union under the hand of the secretary and seven members of the same, shall be sent within 14 days thereafter to the central office hereinbefore mentioned, or in the case of trade-unions registered and doing business exclusively in Scotland or Ireland, to the assistant registrar for Scotland or Ireland, respectively, and shall be registered by them: Provided, That the rules of any trade-union registered before the passing of this act shall not be invalidated by the absence of a provision for dissolution.

15. A trade-union which fails to give any notice or send any document which it is required by this act to give or send, and every officer or other person bound by the rules thereof to give or send the same, or if there be no such officer, then every member of the committee of management of the union, unless proved to have been ignorant of, or to have attempted to prevent the omission to give or send the same, is liable to a penalty of not less than £1 and not more than £5, recoverable at the suit of the chief or any assistant registrar of friendly societies, or of any person aggrieved, and to an additional penalty of the like amount for each week during which the omission continues.

16. So much of section 23 of the principal act as defines the term "trade-union," except the proviso qualifying such definition, is hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof be it enacted as follows:

The term "trade-union" means any combination, whether temporary or permanent, for regulating the relations between workmen and masters, or between workmen and workmen, or between masters and masters, or for imposing restrictive conditions on the conduct of any trade or business, whether such combination would or would not, if the principal act had not been passed, have been deemed to have been an unlawful combination by reason of some one or more of its purposes being in restraint of trade.

ENGLISH TRADE-UNION ACT AMENDMENT, 1906.

Chap. 47. An act to provide for the regulation of trades-union and trade disputes. (Dec. 21, 1906.)

Be it enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. The following paragraph shall be added as a new paragraph after the first paragraph of section 3 of the conspiracy and protection of property act, 1875:

"An act done in pursuance of an agreement or combination by two or more persons shall, if done in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute, not be actionable unless the act, if done without any such agreement or combination, would be actionable."

2. (1) It shall be lawful for one or more persons, acting on their own behalf or on behalf of a trade-union or of an individual employer or firm in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute, to attend at or near a house or place where a person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be, if they so attend merely for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information or of peacefully persuading any person to work or abstain from working.

(2) Section 7 of the conspiracy and protection of property act, 1875, is hereby repealed from "attending at or near" to the end of the section.

3. An act done by a person in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute shall not be actionable on the ground only that it induces some other person to break a contract of employment or that it is an interference with the trade, business, or employment of some other person, or with the right of some other person to dispose of his capital or his labor as he wills.

4. (1) An action against a trade-union, whether of workmen or masters, or against any members or officials thereof on behalf of themselves and all other members of the trade-union in respect of any tortious act alleged to have been committed by or on behalf of the trade union shall not be entertained by any court.

(2) Nothing in this section shall affect the liability of the trustees of a trade-union to be sued in the events provided for by the trades-union act, 1871, section 9, except in respect of any tortious act committed by or on behalf of the union in contemplation or in furtherance of a trade dispute.

5. (1) This act may be cited as the trade-disputes act, 1906, and the trade-union acts, 1871 and 1876, and this act may be cited together as the trade-union acts, 1871 to 1906.

(2) In this act the expression "trade-union" has the same meaning as in the trade-union acts, 1871 and 1876, and shall include any combination as therein defined, notwithstanding that such combination may be the branch of a trade-union.

(3) In this act and in the conspiracy and protection of property act, 1875, the expression "trade dispute" means any dispute between employers and workmen or between workmen and workmen which is connected with the employment or nonemployment or the terms of the employment or with the conditions of labor of any person, and the expression "workmen" means all persons employed in trade or industry, whether or not in the employment of the employer with whom a trade dispute arises; and, in section 3 of the last-mentioned act, the words "between employers and workmen" shall be repealed.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] eight minutes. I have eight minutes remaining, and I yield eight minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, this question has been so thoroughly discussed from the legal viewpoint that I feel justified in looking at it for a few moments from a different angle. I believe that there is real need for this proposed legislation and that the need for it is largely the result of the changed conditions which have come during the past 50 or 60 years, largely as a result of the invention and perfection of labor-saving machinery.

In natural opportunities this country stands without a parallel, so far as I know. Its immense area of rich agricultural land, its vast bodies of fine forest, its great measures of coal and oil and gas, its immense quantity of iron and copper and gold and silver, all waiting for the developing touch of labor, put our country in a class all its own.

Add to these natural opportunities the remarkable inventive genius of the American people, and the remarkable perfection of the machines they have invented for converting these natural opportunities into the form of concrete wealth, and then add to all that the productive power of the millions upon millions of laborers who came to our shores ready for work and willing to work, and you have a combination for producing wealth almost beyond the power of the imagination to conceive.

The result has been that our natural wealth has increased by leaps and bounds.

The census of 1900 estimated the natural wealth at about $110,000,000,000.

But how was that wealth distributed among the people?

That census gave us 12,500,000 families in the United States.

The unchallenged fact is that in the distribution of the national wealth more than half of it was owned by 125,000 families. In other words, 125,000 of these families owned more of the Nation's wealth than the other 12,375,000 families, or, in yet other words, 1 per cent of the families of the country owned more property than the other 99 per cent.

And owning so much of the country's wealth also includes owning largely the means of producing more wealth.

And during the past decade these conditions have doubtless become greatly intensified.

The consolidation of banking institutions and of life insurance companies and of trusts of one kind and another during the past 10 years has no doubt concentrated the wealth of the country in the hands of even fewer people who control not alone their own funds, but also vast amounts of trust funds placed in their hands and quite as serviceable to them as if their own.

This is not a mere theory, it is an actual condition, and must be reckoned with. As I said before, it results largely from the invention of labor-saving and wealth-producing machinery, and from the further fact that the laws were made in the interest of a favored few, who also managed to get most of the benefits accruing from these inventions.

While these machines and these millions of workers were creating wealth so rapidly, wisdom would have suggested legislative action to prevent the creation of an aristocracy of wealth, and, for the greater safety of republican government, secure a more general distribution of it, but instead of doing so, we legislated through protective tariff laws and patent laws, for the very purpose of gathering it into the coffers of a few only of our people. A result is, as I have stated, that to-day the great bulk of the wealth of the country is concentrated in the hands of a comparatively few of our people, and those few insist on running not only the business of the country but its politics also.

It is axiomatic that wealth is power, and hence that those who control the wealth of a country will to a corresponding extent exercise the power in that country.

Under our system of government the courts are to society almost what the rudder is to the ship. They have the last word as to the meaning of the laws enacted.

Then, too, in many ways judicial decisions give trend and direction to new conditions concerning which rights have to be determined before legislative action is had.

Hence if the great special interests could nominate the men who are to pass upon the laws and declare their meaning, it would not make very much difference who made the laws.

Fletcher, of Saltoun, said, "Give me the making of the people's ballads, and I care not who makes their laws."

He would have been more accurate had he said, "Give me power to name the men who construe the laws, and I care not who makes them."

If I am not mistaken there is a feeling pretty general among the people, and growing quite too rapidly, that the "big interests" wield altogether too great an influence in the selection of the men who occupy places on the Federal bench. In my opinion a great many, even of conservative people, think the Federal judiciary is recruited too largely from the ranks of those lawyers who have been the professional representatives of great interests, and that they have in some instances been so far affected by their professional environment as to forget the due and proper relations between the rights of persons and the rights of property. This result might naturally be expected. The training of years can not be put aside quickly. Their lives were spent fighting for the rights of property, and that point of view is apt to remain, for they continue human after their elevation to the bench.

This thought gives much sanction to the position urged by Mr. Bryan, that the indorsements of successful applicants for places on the Federal bench should be made public. As a result of this attempted deification of property and property rights there is to-day a very sharp conflict waging, and this bill is one of the results of that conflict.

A great man from my State, one of the greatest of Americans; nay, one of the greatest of men, said that on a question between the man and the dollar he stood for the rights of the man as against the rights of the dollar [applause]; and on that proposition I stand with him. Property rights are getting too much recognition at the expense of human rights, and this bill is simply an attempt to get back to where Abraham Lincoln would have us; it is simply an assertion of the rights of men as against the rights of property. [Applause.]

I am willing to acknowledge the great value of precedents in the administration of justice, especially wise and sound precedents, but I sometimes think we lawyers are too much wedded to and guided by precedents, especially when we are dealing with conditions essentially different from those under which the precedents were made. The eminent gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON] tells us what courts and judges have said in the past, and argues as if he thought when a court has said something it should be as a law of the Medes and Persians. Without admitting the accuracy of his views as to what the courts have said, I maintain that under the conditions which confront us we have a right to take new ground and to meet new conditions by new remedial measures.

This bill is based on the theory that under the guise of restraining orders and injunctions the equity powers of the courts have been misused, if not abused, by Federal judges in the interest of property rights, and, as I have said, their former professional connection too often gives color to the charge and often inclines the public to believe it may be so. The belief is quite general, and some of the cases give it foundation, that Federal judges have stretched the equity powers of the court till they extend into the field of the common law, and even to that of the criminal law. This constitutes a serious invasion of the constitutional rights of the citizen, as it deprives him of the right of trial by jury in cases where he is entitled to it by the fundamental law.

In this struggle for human rights as against the rights of property those who are ranged on the side of the man against the dollar are not asking for anything they are not entitled to. They contend that they are not the aggressors. They are only defending rights they already had and which, through the aggression of their opponents, they are in danger of losing. They are not asking for special legislation; they only ask that they be not made the victims of special laws made by the courts through the unjust, unlawful, and unwise extension of its equity powers.

It is to prevent this unhappy result that this bill is offered, and it is wisely and conservatively intended to reach that situation, and is, in my judgment, a happy solution of the difficulty, giving to the man and the dollar the rights which each is entitled to.

I will not attempt a complete analysis of the bill, but I do desire to call attention to a few of the changes it makes.

In any system for the administration of justice there is no fact more important or fundamental than notice to the party to be affected. It is axiomatic that every man is entitled to his day in court. To deprive a man of his rights without notice and a chance to be heard is the grossest tyranny, unless giving such notice would work a greater injury to some one else.

Perhaps there is no severer indictment of the tyrant Nero than that he caused his imperial rescripts to be posted so high upon the walls of Rome that the citizens could not read them and then punished them for the violation of laws of which they had no proper notice.

The practice of issuing temporary injunctions without notice has grown to be too common. Often a temporary restraining order so issued was allowed to stand indefinitely, although supported by no evidence beyond a sworn statement that if it did not issue without notice irreparable injury would result. Under the provisions of this bill it will be necessary to state the facts showing how irreparable injury would follow if the order is not issued, and when issued the temporary order must at once be entered on the court record and remains valid for only seven days after entry. Under certain conditions it may be extended seven more days only without notice to the party affected.

Another cause for complaint has been that the injunction order often referred those affected by it to the bill of complaint for details as to what the court commanded them to do or not to do. As the court and court files were often far removed from the place where the order was to be in effect, it was difficult for those concerned to know just what was prohibited. This bill cures that by providing that the order itself shall give the necessary information.

Under the present arrangement it is in the discretion of the judge whether he shall require the complainant to give bond. This bill prohibits the issuing of any injunction or restraining order until a good and sufficient bond is first filed.

Many restraining orders heretofore issued in labor disputes were so worded as to include everybody in the world. This bill limits the restraining order to the parties defendant and those acting in concert with them, and is binding only on those who in some way have actual notice of it.

It also contains a provision against compulsory personal service, vindicates the right of freedom of speech and of peaceably assembling in a lawful manner, and of doing anything which might lawfully be done if there were no labor dispute pending. The bill is, in my judgment, both wise and necessary. For years there has been a demand for it; Presidents have recommended it; measure after measure has been introduced and considered; but, until a Democratic House took it up, it continued to slumber peacefully in the appropriate pigeonhole.

To-day the Democratic House will breathe the breath of life into it and start it on its way. I hope it will soon find a place in the statute book, and that it will prove a buttress, a bulwark to protect human rights against the unjust encroachments of mere property rights. [Applause.]

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to speak of this bill as a lawyer or to discuss the legal aspects of it. The report of the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary and the very able arguments of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] leave nothing to be said in regard to the legal aspects of the measure.

What I should like to do is to call attention to and emphasize an unfortunate and, as it seems to me, a certain dangerous attitude which has been assumed and, I presume, is still held toward remedial legislation of this kind. In the report of the hearings on the matter of injunctions before the Committee on the Judiciary an attorney representing an association opposing the enactment into law of any of the propositions being considered by the committee disclosed the attitude that I have indicated. One of the members of the committee said to him:

I should like to ask you this question: In the course of an experience which has been more extensive than that of any other man I know, has it come to your observation that the writ of injunction in its issuance is abused in any way at all?

The reply was:

Never. They are really very hard to get.

He was asked further:

Is there any suggestion that it occurs to you to make for a change in the administration of the law?

And he replied:

No; not even the one contained in the proposition of Mr. MOON in the last Congress * * *.

The proposition of Mr. MOON is, I believe, what is now being offered as a substitute for the bill under consideration.

It is conclusively shown by what has been stated this afternoon by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] that abuses do exist, so serious that they have called forth messages from at least two Presidents of the United States, one of whom was formerly a Federal judge. It is a matter of common knowledge that many other judges declare that such abuses do exist, and any lawyer who has had occasion to keep posted as to the law of injunctions knows it, and, if he is frank, will so admit. Therefore the gentleman to whom I refer differs with the entire Judiciary Committee and with these judges and lawyers.

Employers of labor have a right to expect and demand that those attorneys whom they employ to guard what they believe to be their rights in matters of this kind shall advise them not only what the law is, but also when abuses have arisen what the law ought to be, and I repeat that it is most unfortunate that those who are learned in the law should not deem that they have a higher duty to perform than merely giving such advice as may, from a purely selfish point of view, seem to be in the interest of those by whom they are retained, namely, to endeavor to be real counselors on one of the gravest problems of the day.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the report of the committee on this bill, the acts of Congress relating to injunctions, and also the views of the minority on the same bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the matter indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The reports referred to are as follows:

[House Report No. 612, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

REGULATION OF INJUNCTIONS.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 23635:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration H. R. 23635, to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, report the same back with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The too ready issuance of injunctions or the issuance without proper precautions or safeguards has been called to the attention of the Congress session after session for many years. The bill now reported seeks to remedy the evils complained of by legislation directed to those specific matters which have given rise to most criticism. These matters are so segregated in various sections of the bill that they may be separately discussed.

I.

The first section of the bill amends section 263 of the judicial code, which relates to two distinct steps in the procedure, namely, notice and security. But the amended section relates only to the notice, leaving the matter of security to be dealt with by a new section, 266a.

FORMER STATUTES.

In order to fully understand the subject of notice in injunction cases it is necessary to give an historical résumé of the subject. In the judiciary act of 1789, which was passed during the first session of that year, Congress having created the different courts according to the scheme outlined by Chief Justice Ellsworth, conferred upon the courts power to issue all writs, including writs of ne exeat (a form of injunction), according to legal usages and practice. In 1793, however, there was a revision of that statute, and among other things the same powers, substantially, were conferred upon the judges as before; but at the end of the section authorizing the issuance of injunctions was this language: "No injunction shall be issued in any case without reasonable previous notice to the adverse party or his attorney."

The law stood thus until the general revision of 1873, during which period the law expressly required reasonable notice to be given in all cases. But the will of Congress as thus expressed was completely thwarted and the statute nullified by the peculiar construction placed upon it by the courts. The question frequently arose. The courts got around it in various ways, but usually by holding that it did not apply to a case of threatened irreparable injury, notwithstanding that its language was broad and sweeping, plainly covering all cases. Another form of expression often used is found in Ex parte Poultney (4 Peters C. C. C., 472):

"Every court of equity possesses the power to mold its rules in relation to the time of appearing and answering so as to prevent the rule from working injustice, and it is not only in the power of the court, but it is its duty to exercise a sound discretion upon this subject."

The court found a similar method of evading the sweeping prohibition of the revision of 1793, with respect to notice in Lawrence v. Bowman. (1 U. S. C., Alester, 230.)

But the earliest provision requiring notice came before the Supreme Court in 1799, in New York v. Connecticut (4 Dall., 1). Its constitutionality was not qustioned. The only issue was as to the sufficiency of the notice, Chief Justice Ellsworth, for the court, saying: "The prohibition contained in the statute that writs of injunction shall not be granted without reasonable notice to the adverse party or his attorney extends to injunctions granted by the Supreme Court or the circuit court as well as to those that may be granted by a single judge. The design and effect, however, of injunctions must render a shorter notice, reasonable notice, in the case of an application to a court than would be so construed in most cases of an application to a single judge, and until a general rule shall be settled the particular circumstances of each case must also be regarded."

Here was a case in which, although no point was made by counsel on any question of constitutionality, the Supreme Court accepted the comprehensive requirement of the act of 1793 as binding on all the Federal courts.

Now we come to the present law, found in section 263 of the Judicial Code, and reading thus:

"Whenever notice is given of a motion for an injunction out of a district court the court or judge thereof may, if there appears to be danger of irreparable injury from delay, grant an order restraining the act sought to be enjoined until the decision upon the motion; and such order may be granted with or without security, in the discretion of the court or judge."

This was the law as contained in section 718 of the Revised Statutes, said section having been enacted in 1872. It simply embodies the practice of the courts with respect to notice, a practice established notwithstanding the nonconformity of the practice to the positive requirement of the act of 1793.

PROPOSED CHANGES.

But it will be seen that the giving of notice and requiring security, left by the present law to the discretion of the court, is by this bill a positive duty, except where irreparable and immediate injury might result from the giving of a notice or the delay incident thereto, in which case the court or judge may issue a temporary restraining order pending the giving of the notice. The concluding part of the amended section has an effect to safeguard parties from the reckless and inconsiderate issuance of restraining orders. Injuries compensable in damages recoverable in an action at law are not treated or considered by the courts as irreparable in any proper legal sense, and parties attempting to show why the injury sought to be restrained is irreparable would often disclose an adequate legal remedy. This provision requires the reason to appear in the order, but it should be read in connection with the new section 266b, requiring the order to be made by the court or judge to be likewise specific in other essentials, and section 266c, requiring that every complaint filed for the purpose of obtaining the order, in the cases there specified, shall contain a particular description of the property or property right for which the prohibitive power of the court is sought, and that such complaint shall be verified.

A valuable provision of the amendment is one that a restraining order issued without notice "shall by its terms expire within such time after entry, not to exceed seven days, as the court or judge may fix, unless within the time so fixed the order is extended or renewed for a like period, after notice to those previously served, if any, and for good cause shown, and the reasons for such extension shall be entered of record."

A legislative precedent for such legislation is found in the act of 1807, wherein it was provided that injunctions granted by the district courts "shall not, unless so ordered by the circuit court, continue longer than to the circuit court next ensuing, nor shall an injunction be issued by a district judge in any case where a party has had a reasonable time to apply to the circuit court for the writ." (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 2, p. 418.)

If the views of President Taft on this subject have not changed, he will welcome an opportunity to approve a bill containing such provisions as those in the amendment governing notice, because in his message of December 7, 1909, to the regular session of the Sixty-first Congress, after a quotation from the Republican platform of 1908, he said:

"I recommend that in compliance with the promise thus made appropriate legislation be adopted. The ends of justice will best be met and the chief cause of complaint against ill-considered injunctions without notice will be removed by the enactment of a statute forbidding hereafter the issuing of any injunction or restraining order, whether temporary or permanent, by any Federal court without previous notice and a reasonable opportunity to be heard on behalf of the parties to be enjoined, unless it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court that the delay necessary to give such notice and hearing would result in irreparable injury to the complainant, and unless, also, the court shall from the evidence make a written finding, which shall be spread upon the court minutes, that immediate and irreparable injury is likely to ensue to the complainant, and shall define the injury, state why it is irreparable, and shall also indorse on the order issued the date and the hour of the issuance of the order. Moreover, every such injunction or restraining order issued without previous notice and opportunity by the defendant to be heard should by force of the statute expire and be of no effect after seven days from the issuance thereof or within any time less than that period which the court may fix, unless within such seven days or such less period the injunction or order is extended or renewed after previous notice and opportunity to be heard.

"My judgment is that the passage of such an act, which really embodies the best practice in equity and is very likely the rule now in force in some courts, will prevent the issuing of ill-advised orders of injunction without notice and will render such orders, when issued, much less objectionable by the short time in which they may remain effective."

II.

Section 266a simply requires security for costs and damages in all cases, leaving it no longer within the discretion of the courts whether any such security or none shall be given.

Prior to the said act of 1872 (contained in the revision of 1873) there appears to have been no legislation on the matter of security in injunction cases; but that security was usually required is a fact well known to the legal profession. It seems clearly just and salutary that the extraordinary writ of injunction should not issue in any case until the party seeking it and for whose benefit it issues has provided the other party with all the protection which security for damages affords.

It appears by the authorities, both English and American, to have been always within the range of judicial discretion, in the absence of a statute, to waive security, though better practice has been to require security as a condition to issuing restraining orders and injunctions.

The new section, 266a, takes the matter of requiring security out of the category of discretionary matters, where it was found by the committee on revision and permitted to remain.

For a discussion of the existing law on the question of security, we refer to Russell v. Farley. (105 U. S., 433.)

III.

Section 266b is of general application. Defendants should never be left to guess at what they are forbidden to do, but the order "shall describe in reasonable detail, and not by reference to the bill of complaint or other document, the act or acts sought to be restrained." It also contains a safeguard against what have been heretofore known as dragnet or blanket injunctions, by which large numbers may be accused, and eventually punished, for violating injunctions in cases in which they were not made parties in the legal sense and of which they had only constructive notice, equivalent in most cases to none at all. Moreover, no person shall be bound by any such order without actual personal notice.

EXISTING LAW AND PRACTICE.

There was heretofore no Federal statute to govern either the matter of making or form and contents of orders for injunctions. Of course, where a restraining order is granted that performs the functions of order, process, and notice. But the writ of injunction, where temporary, is preceded by the entry of an order, and where permanent by the entry of a decree.

The whole matter appears to have been left, both by the States and the Federal Government, to the courts, which have mostly conformed to established principles.

The most important of these was that the order should be sufficiently clear and certain in its terms that the defendants could by an inspection of it readily know what they were forbidden to do.

See Arthur v. Oakes, 63 Fed. Rep., 310, 25 L. R. An., 414; St. Louis Min., etc., Co. v. Co. c. Montana Min. Co., 58 Fed. Rep., 129; Sweet v. Mangham, 4 Jur., 479; 9 L. J. Ch., 323, 34 Eng. Ch., 51; Cother v. Midland R. Co., 22 Eng. Ch., 469.

It should also be in accordance with the terms of the prayer of the bill. (State v. Rush County, 35 Kans., 150; McEldowney v. Lowther, 49 W. Va., 348.) It should not impose a greater restraint than is asked or is necessary (Shubert v. Angeles, 80 N. Y. App. Div., 625; New York Fire Dept. v. Baudet, 4 N. Y. Supp., 206), and should be specific and certain. (Orris v. National Commercial Bank, 81 N. Y. App. Div., 631; St. Rege's Paper Co. v. Santa Clara Lumber Co., 55 N. Y. F. & J., 559; Low v. Innes, 4 De G. J. & S., 286.)

So it appears that section 266b really does not change the best practice with respect to orders, but imposes the duty upon the courts, in mandatory form, to conform to correct rules, as already established by judicial precedent.

That such provision is necessary and timely will appear upon an inspection of some orders which have issued.

For instance, take the case of Kansas & Texas Coal Co. v. Denney, decided in the district court for Arkansas in 1899. And here, as in most of such cases, no full official report of the case can be obtained, but a mere memorandum. In this case the defendants (strikers) were ordered to be and were enjoined from "congregating at or near or on the premises of the property of the Kansas & Texas Coal Co. in, about, or near the town of Huntington, Ark., or elsewhere, for the purpose of intimidating its employees or preventing said employees from rendering service to the Kansas & Texas Coal Co. from inducing or coercing by threats, intimidation, force, or violence any of said employees to leave the employment of the said Kansas & Texas Coal Co., or from in any manner interfering with or molesting any person or persons who may be employed or seek employment by and of the Kansas & Texas Coal Co. in the operation of its coal mines at or near said town of Huntington, or elsewhere."

It will be observed that a defendant in that suit would render himself liable to punishment for contempt if he met a man seeking employment by the company in a foreign country and persuaded him not to enter its service.

The bill further provides that it shall be "binding only upon parties to the suit, their agents, servants, employees, and attorneys, or those in active concert with them, and who shall by personal service or otherwise have received actual notice of the same." Unquestionably this is the true rule, but unfortunately the courts have not uniformly observed it. Much of the criticism which arose from the Debs case (64 Fed. Rep., 724) was due to the fact that the court undertook to make the order effective not only upon the parties to the suit and those in concert with them, but upon all other persons whomsoever. In Scott v. Donald (165 U. S., 117), the court rebuked a violation by the lower court in the following language:

"The decree is also objectionable because it enjoins persons not parties to the suit. This is not a case where the defendants named represent those not named. Nor is there alleged any conspiracy between the parties defendant and other unknown parties. The acts complained of are tortious and do not grow out of any common action or agreement between constables and sheriffs of the State of South Carolina. We have indeed a right to presume that such officers, though not named in this suit, will, when advised that certain provisions of the act in question have been pronounced unconstitutional by the court to which the Constitution of the United States refers such questions, voluntarily refrain from enforcing such provisions; but we do not think it comports with well-settled principles of equity procedure to include them in an injunction in a suit in which they were not heard or represented or to subject them to penalties for contempt in disregarding such an injunction. (Fellows v. Fellows, 4 John. Chan., 25, citing Iveson v. Harris, 7 Ves., 257.)

"The decree of the court below should therefore be amended by being restricted to the parties named as plaintiff and defendants in the bill, and this is directed to be done, and it is otherwise."

IV.

Section 266c is concerned with cases between "employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment."

The first clause of the new section 266c relates to the contents and form of the complaint. It must disclose a threatened irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application for which there is no adequate remedy at law. And the property or property right must be described "with particularity."

These requirements are merely those of good pleading and correct practice in such cases established by a long line of precedents, well understood by the profession and which should be but perhaps have not been uniformly applied. To show this it is only necessary to briefly state the applicable rules, citing some of the numerous authorities.

As the granting of an injunction rests in some degree in the discretion of the chancellor, allegations in the complaint should show candor and frankness. (Moffatt v. Calvert County Commissioners, 97 Md., 266; Johnston v. Glenn, 40 Md., 200; Edison Storage Battery Co. v. Edison Automobile Co., 67 N. J. Eq., 44; Sharp v. Ashton, 3 Ves. & B., 144.)

The omission of material facts which, in the nature of the case, must be known to the plaintiff will preclude the granting of the relief. (Sprigg v. Western Tel. Co., 46 Md., 67; Walker v. Burks, 48 Tex., 206.)

An injunction may be refused if the allegations are argumentative and inferential. (Battle v. Stevens, 32 Ga., 25; Warsop v. Hastings, 22 Minn., 437.)

The allegations of the complaint must be definite and certain. (St. Louis v. Knapp Co., 104 U. S., 658.)

The complaint must set forth the facts with particularity and minuteness (Minor v. Terry, Code Rep. N. S. (N. S.), 384), and no material fact should be left to inference. (Warsop v. Hastings, 22 Minn., 437; Philphower v. Todd, 11 N. J. Eq., 54; Perkins v. Collins, 3 N. J. Eq., 482.)

Facts, and not the conclusions or opinions of the pleader, must be stated. (McBride v. Ross (D. C.), 13 App. Cas., 576.)

An injunction should not ordinarily be granted when the material allegations are made upon information and belief. (Brooks v. O'Hara, 8 Fed. Rep., 529; In re Holmes, 3 Fed. Rep. Cases No. 1, 562.)

The complaint must clearly show the threats or acts of defendant which cause him to apprehend future injury. (Mendelson v. McCabe, 144 Cal., 230; Ryan v. Fulghurn, 96 Ga., 234.) And it is not sufficient to allege that the defendant claims the right to do an act which plaintiff believes illegal and injurious to him, since the intention to exercise the right must be alleged. (Lutman v. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co., 56 Ohio St., 433; Attorney General v. Eau Claire, 37 Wis., 400.)

The bill must allege facts which clearly show that the plaintiff will sustain substantial injury because of the acts complained of. (Home Electric Light, etc., Co. v. Gobe Tissue Paper Co., 146 Ind., 673; Boston, etc., Ry. Co. v. Sullivan, 177 Mass., 230; McGovern v. Loder (N. J. Ch., 1890), 20 Atl. Rep., 209; Smith v. Lockwood, 13 Barb., 209; Jones v. Stewart (Tenn. Ch. App., 1900), 61 Sev., 105; Spokane St. R. Co. v. Spokane, 5 Wash., 634; State v. Eau Claire, 40 Wis., 533.)

And it is not sufficient to merely allege injury without stating the facts. (Giffing v. Gibb, 2 Black, 519; Spooner v. McConnell, 22 Fed. Cases, No. 13245; Bowling v. Crook, 104 Ala., 130; Grant v. Cooke, 7 D. C., 165; Coast Line R. Co. v. Caben, 50 Ga., 451; Dinwiddie v. Roberts, 1 Greene, 363; Wabaska Electric Co. v. Wymore Co., Nebr., 199; Lubrs v. Sturtevant, 10 Or., 170; Farland v. Wood, 35 W. Va., 458.)

Since the jurisdiction in equity depends on the lack of an adequate remedy at law, a bill for an injunction must state facts from which the court can determine that the remedy at law is inadequate. (Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Tr. Co., 157 U. S., 429; Safe Deposit, etc., Co. v. Anniston, 96 Fed. Rep., 661.)

If the inadequacy of the legal remedy depends upon the defendant's insolvency, the fact of insolvency must be positively alleged. (Fullington v. Kyle Lumber Co., 139 Ala., 242; Graham v. Tankersley, 15 Ala., 634.)

An injunction will not be granted unless the complaint shows that a refusal to grant the writ will work irreparable injury. (California Nav. Co. v. Union Transp. Co., 122 Cal., 641; Cook County Brick Co.,

92 Ill. App., 526; Manufacturers' Gas Co. v. Indiana Nat. Gas, etc., Co., 156 Ind., 679.) And it is not sufficient simply to allege that the injury will be irreparable, but the facts must be stated so that the court may see that the apprehension of irreparable injury is well founded. (California Nav. Co. v. Union Transp. Co., 122 Cal., 641; Empire Transp. Co. v. Johnson, 76 Conn., 79; Orange City v. Thayer, 45 Fla., 502.)

The plaintiff must allege that he has done or is willing to do everything which is necessary to entitle him to the relief sought. (Stanley v. Gadsley, 10 Pet. (U. S.), 521; Elliott v. Sibley, 101 Ala., 344; Burham v. San Francisco Fuse Mfg. Co., 76 Cal., 26; Sloan v. Coolbaugh, 10 Iowa, 31; Lewis v. Wilson, 17 N. Y. Supp., 128; Spann v. Sterns, 18 Tex., 556.)

The second paragraph of section 266c is concerned with specific acts which the best opinion of the courts holds to be within the right of parties involved upon one side or the other of a trades dispute. The necessity for legislation concerning them arises out of the divergent views which the courts have expressed on the subject and the difference between courts in the application of recognized rules. It may be proper to notice, in passing, that the State courts furnish precedents frequently for action by the Federal courts, and vice versa, so that a pernicious rule or an error in one jurisdiction is quickly adopted by the other. It is not contended that either the Federal or the State courts have stood alone in any of the precedents which are disapproved. The provisions of this section of the bill are self-explanatory, and in justification of the language used we content ourselves with submitting quotations from recognized authorities. We classify these authorities by quoting, first, the clauses of the bill to which they have particular reference.

The first clause:

"And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do."

In Allis Chalmers Co. v. Iron Molders' Union (C. C., 150 Fed. R., 155), Judge Sanborn said:

"The conclusion to be drawn from the cases, as applicable to this controversy, is, I think, that the combination of the defendant unions, their members, and the defendant O'Leary, to strike, and to further enforce the strike, and if possible to bring the employers to terms by preventing them from obtaining other workmen to replace the strikers, was not unlawful, because grounded on just cause or excuse, being the economic advancement of the union molders and the competition of labor against capital."

In Arthur v. Oakes (63 Fed. R., 310, 317), Justice Harlan, for the court, said:

"If an employee quits without cause, and in violation of an express contract to serve for a stated time, then his quitting would not be of right, and he would be liable for any damages resulting from a breach of his agreement, and perhaps, in some states of case, to criminal prosecution for loss of life or limb by passengers or others, directly resulting from his abandoning his post at a time when care and watchfulness were required upon his part in the discharge of a duty he had undertaken to perform. And it may be assumed for the purposes of this discussion that he would be liable in like manner where the contract of service, by necessary implication arising out of the nature or the circumstances of the employment, required him not to quit the service of his employer suddenly and without reasonable notice of his intention to do so. But the vital question remains: Whether a court of equity will, under any circumstances, by injunction, prevent one individual from quitting the personal service of another? An affirmative answer to this question is not, we think, justified by any authority to which our attention has been called or of which we are aware. It would be an invasion of one's natural liberty to compel him to work for or to remain in the personal service of another. One who is placed under such constraint is in a condition of involuntary servitude—a condition which the supreme law of the land declares shall not exist within the United States or in any place subject to their jurisdiction. Courts of equity have sometimes sought to sustain a contract for services requiring special knowledge or skill by enjoining acts or conduct that would constitute a breach of such contract.

* * * * * * *

"The rule, we think, is without exception that equity will not compel the actual, affirmative performance by an employee of merely personal services, any more than it will compel an employer to retain in his personal service one who, no matter for what cause, is not acceptable to him for service of that character. The right of an employee engaged to perform personal service to quit that service rests upon the same basis as the right of his employer to discharge him from further personal service. If the quitting in the one case or the discharging in the other is in violation of the contract between the parties, the one injured by the breach has his action for damages; and a court of equity will not, indirectly or negatively, by means of an injunction restraining the violation of the contract, compel the affirmative performance from day to day or the affirmative acceptance of merely personal services. Relief of that character has always been regarded as impracticable."

Sitting with Justice Harlan at circuit in that case were other learned jurists, but there was no dissent from these views.

In this connection we cite from the luminous opinion by Judge Loring delivering the opinion in Pickett v. Walsh (192 Mass., 572), a clear exposition of our views here expressed. We regret the necessity of limiting the quotation, because the whole opinion could be studied with profit.

"The case is one of competition between the defendant unions and the individual plaintiffs for the work of pointing. The work of pointing for which these two sets of workmen are competing is work which the contractors are obliged to have. One peculiarity of the case, therefore, is that the fight here is necessarily a triangular one. It necessarily involves the two sets of competing workmen and the contractor, and is not confined to the two parties to the contract, as is the case where workmen strike to get better wages from their employer or other conditions which are better for them. In this respect the case is like Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor (23 Q. B. D., 598; S. C., on appeal (1892); A. C., 25).

"The right which the defendant unions claim to exercise in carrying their point in the course of this competition is a trade advantage, namely, that they have labor which the contractors want, or, if you please, can not get elsewhere; and they insist upon using this trade advantage to get additional work, namely, the work of pointing the bricks and stone which they lay. It is somewhat like the advantage which the owner of back land has when he has bought the front lot. He is not bound to sell them separately. To be sure, the right of an individual owner to sell both or none is not decisive of the right of a labor union to combine to refuse to lay bricks or stone unless they are given the job of pointing the bricks laid by them. There are things which an individual can do which a combination of individuals can not do. But having regard to the right on which the defendants' organization as a labor union rests, the correlative duty owed by it to others, and the limitation of the defendants' rights coming from the increased power of organization, we are of opinion that it was within the rights of these unions to compete for the work of doing the pointing and, in the exercise of their right of competition, to refuse to lay bricks and set stone unless they were given the work of pointing them when laid. (See in this connection Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass., 492, 502; Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass., 353, 357.)

"The result to which that conclusion brings us in the case at bar ought not to be passed without consideration.

"The result is harsh on the contractors, who prefer to give the work to the pointers, because (1) the pointers do it by contract (in which case the contractors escape the liability incident to the relation of employer and employee); because (2) the contractors think that the pointers do the work better, and if not well done the buildings may be permanently injured by acid; and, finally, (3) because they get from the pointers better work with less liability at a smaller cost. Again, so far as the pointers (who can not lay brick or stone) are concerned, the result is disastrous. But all that the labor unions have done is to say you must employ us for all the work or none of it. They have not said that if you employ the pointers you must pay us a fine, as they did in Carew v. Rutherford (106 Mass., 1). They have not undertaken to forbid the contractors employing pointers, as they did in Plant v. Woods (176 Mass., 492). So far as the labor unions are concerned, the contractors can employ pointers if they choose, but if the contractors choose to give the work of pointing the bricks and stones to others the unions take the stand that the contractors will have to get some one else to lay them. The effect of this in the case at bar appears to be that the contractors are forced against their will to give the work of pointing to the masons and bricklayers. But the fact that the contractors are forced to do what they do not want to do is not decisive of the legality of the labor union's acts. That is true wherever a strike is successful. The contractors doubtless would have liked it better if there had been no competition between the bricklayers' and masons' unions on the one hand and the individual pointers on the other hand. But there is competition. There being competition, they prefer the course they have taken. They prefer to give all the work to the unions rather than get nonunion men to lay bricks and stone to be pointed by the plaintiffs.

"Further, the effect of complying with the labor unions' demands apparently will be the destruction of the plaintiff's business. But the fact that the business of a plaintiff is destroyed by the acts of the defendants done in pursuance of their right of competition is not decisive of the illegality of the acts. It was well said by Hammond, J., in Martell v. White (185 Mass., 255, 260) in regard to the right of a citizen to pursue his business without interference by a combination to destroy it: 'Speaking generally, however, competition in business is permitted, although frequently disastrous to those engaged in it. It is always selfish, often sharp, and sometimes deadly.'

* * * * * * *

"The application of the right of the defendant unions, who are composed of bricklayers and stonemasons, to compete with the individual plaintiffs, who can do nothing but pointing (as we have said), is in the case at bar disastrous to the pointers and hard on the contractors. But this is not the first case where the exercise of the right of competition ends in such a result. The case at bar is an instance where the evils which are or may be incident to competition bear very harshly on those interested, but in spite of such evils competition is necessary to the welfare of the community."

To the same effect is Allis-Chalmers Co. v. Iron Molders' Union (C. C.) (150 Fed. Rep., 155), per Sanborn, J.

The consensus of judicial view, as expressed in these cases and others which might be cited, is that workingmen may lawfully combine to further their material interests without limit or constraint, and may for that purpose adopt any means or mehods which are lawful. It is the enjoyment and exercise of that right and none other that this bill forbids the courts to interfere with.

The second clause:

"Or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works, or carries on business, or happens to be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working."

This language is taken from the British trades dispute act of 1906, the second section of which is as follows:

"It shall be lawful for one or more persons acting on their own behalf or on behalf of an individual, corporation, or firm in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute to attend at or near a house or place where a person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be if they so attend merely for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information or of peacefully persuading any person to work or abstain from work."

This, it has been said, "might well be termed a codification of the law relating to peaceful picketing as laid down by a majority of the American courts." (Martin's Law of Labor Unions, sec. 173.) Upon the general subject the same author says:

"There are some decisions which hold that all picketing is unlawful, and it has been said that from the very nature of things peaceful picketing is of rare occurrence and "very much of an illusion," yet the view taken by the majority of decisions and which is best supported by reason is that picketing, if not conducted in such numbers as will of itself amount to intimidation, and when confined to the seeking of information such as the number and names and places of residence of those at work or seeking work on the premises against which the strike is in operation, and to the use of peaceful argument and entreaty for the purpose of procuring such workmen to support the strike by quitting work or by not accepting work, is not unlawful, and will furnish no ground for injunction or an action at law for damages. * * * That the views set forth in this section are correct does not admit of doubt. Indeed, it may readily be seen that the right almost universally conceded to striking workmen to use peaceable argument and persuasion to induce other workmen to aid them in their strike might, and very probably would be, most seriously hampered if the right of picketing were denied. "The right to persuade new men to quit or decline employment is of little worth unless the strikers may ascertain who are the men that their late employer has persuaded or is attempting to persuade to accept employment." While it is true that in the guise of picketing strikers may obstruct and annoy the new men, and by insult and menacing attitude intimidate them as effectually as by physical assault, yet it can always be determined from the evidence whether the efforts of the pickets are limited to getting into communication with the new men for the purpose of presenting arguments and appeals to their free judgment." (Martin's Modern Law of Labor Unions, sec. 169, pp. 233, 234, and 235.)

The third clause:

"Or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute; or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do."

The best opinion to be gathered from the conflicting opinions on this matter have been well summarized in the most recent textbook on the subject as follows:

"It is lawful for members of a union, acting by agreement among themselves, to cease to patronize a person against whom the concert of action is directed when they regard it for their interest to do so. This is the so-called 'primary boycott,' and in furtherance thereof it is lawful to circulate notices among the members of the union to cease patronizing one with whom they have a trade dispute and to announce their intention to carry their agreement into effect. For instance, if an employer of labor refuses to employ union men the union has a right to say that its members will not patronize him. A combination between persons merely to regulate their own conduct and affairs is allowable, and a lawful combination, though others may be indirectly affected thereby. And the fact that the execution of the agreement may tend to diminish the profits of the party against whom such act is aimed does not render the participants liable to a prosecution for a criminal conspiracy or to a suit for injunction. Even though he sustain financial loss, he will be without remedy, either in a court of law or a court of equity. So long as the primary object of the combination is to advance its own interests and not to inflict harm on the person against whom it is directed, it is not possible to see how any claim of illegality could be sustained." (Martin's Modern Law of Labor Unions, pp. 107, 108, and 109.)

"It is not unlawful for members of a union or their sympathizers to use, in aid of a justifiable strike, peaceable argument and persuasion to induce customers of the person against whom the strike is in operation to withhold their patronage from him, although their purpose in so doing is to injure the business of their former employer and constrain him to yield to their demands, and the same rule applies where the employer has locked out his employees. These acts may be consummated by direct communication or through the medium of the press, and it is only when the combination becomes a conspiracy to injury, by threats and coercion, the property rights of another that the power of the courts can be invoked. The vital distinction between combinations of this character and boycotts is that here no coercion is present, while, as was heretofore shown, coercion is a necessary element of a boycott. In applying the principles stated it has been held that the issuance of circulars by members of a labor union notifying persons engaged in the trade of controversies existing between such members and their employer and requesting such persons not to deal with the employer is not unlawful and will not be enjoined where no intimidation or violence is used." (Martin's Modern Law of Labor Unions, pp. 109 and 110.)

Said Mr. Justice Van Orsdel in his concurring opinion in Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia (the American Federation of Labor et al., appellants, v. The Bucks Stove & Range Co., No. 1916, decided Mar. 11, 1909):

* * * * * * *

"Applying the same principle, I conceive it to be the privilege of one man, or a number of men, to individually conclude not to patronize a certain person or corporation. It is also the right of these men to agree together, and to advise others, not to extend such patronage. That advice may be given by direct communication or through the medium of the press, so long as it is neither in the nature of coercion or a threat.

"As long as the actions of this combination of individuals are lawful, to this point it is not clear how they can become unlawful because of their subsequent acts directed against the same person or corporation. To this point there is no conspiracy—no boycott. The word "boycott" is here used as referring to what is usually understood as "the secondary boycott," and when used in this opinion it is intended to be applied exclusively in that sense. It is, therefore, only when the combination becomes a conspiracy to injure by threats and coercion the property rights of another that the power of the courts can be invoked. This point must be passed before the unlawful and unwarranted acts which the courts will punish and restrain are committed.

"The definition of a boycott given by Judge Taft in Toledo Co. v. Penna. Co. (54 Fed., 730) is as follows: 'As usually understood, a boycott is a combination of many to cause a loss to one person by coercing others against their will to withdraw from him their beneficial business intercourse through threats that, unless those others do so, the many will cause similar loss to them.' In Gray v. Building Trades Council (91 Minn., 171) the word 'boycott' is defined as follows: 'A boycott may be defined to be a combination of several persons to cause a loss to a third person by causing others against their will to withdraw from him their beneficial business intercourse through threats that unless a compliance with their demands be made the persons forming the combination will cause loss or injury to him, or an organization formed to exclude a person from business relations with others by persuasion, intimidation, and other acts which tend to violence, and thereby cause him through fear of resulting injury to submit to dictation in the management of his affairs. Such acts constitute a conspiracy and may be restrained by injunction.' In Brace Bros. v. Evans (3 R. & Corp. L. J., 561) it is said: 'The word itself implies a threat. In popular acceptation it is an organized effort to exclude a person from business relations with others by persuasion, intimidation, and other acts which tend to violence, and they coerce him, through fear of resulting injury, to submit to dictation in the management of his affairs.'

"It will be observed that the above definitions are in direct conflict with the earlier English decisions and indicate a distinct departure by our courts. This undoubtedly is in recognition of the right of a number of individuals to combine for the purpose of improving their condition. The rule of the English common law, from which we have so far departed, is expressed in Bowen v. Hall (6 Q. B. Div., 333) as follows: 'If the persuasion be used for the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff, or of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff, it is a malicious act, which is in law and in fact a wrong act, and therefore a wrongful act, and therefore an actionable act if injury ensues from it.'

"From this clear distinction it will be observed that there is no boycott until the members of the organization have passed the point of refusing to patronize the person or corporation themselves and have entered the field where, by coercion or threats, they prevent others from dealing with such persons or corporation. I fully agree with this distinction.

"So long, then, as the American Federation of Labor and those acting under its advice refused to patronize complainant, the combination had not arisen to the dignity of an unlawful conspiracy or a boycott."

In Hopkins v. Oxley Stave Co. (83 Fed. R., 912), Judge Caldwell, in a dissenting opinion, said:

"While laborers, by the application to them of the doctrine we are considering, are reduced to individual action, it is not so with the forces arrayed against them. A corporation is an association of individuals for combined action; trusts are corporations combined together for the very purpose of collective action and boycotting; and capital, which is the product of labor, is in itself a powerful collective force. Indeed, according to this supposed rule, every corporation and trust in the country is an unlawful combination, for while its business may be of a kind that its individual members, each acting for himself, might lawfully conduct, the moment they enter into a combination to do that same thing by their combined effort the combination becomes an unlawful conspiracy. But the rule is never so applied.

"Corporations and trusts and other combinations of individuals and aggregations of capital extend themselves right and left through the entire community, boycotting and inflicting irreparable damage upon and crushing out all small dealers and producers, stifling competition, establishing monopolies, reducing the wages of the laborer, raising the price of food on every man's table and of the clothes on his back and of the house that shelters him, and inflicting on the wage earners the pains and penalties of the lockout and the black list, and denying to them the right of association and combined action by refusing employment to those who are members of labor organizations; and all these things are justified as a legitimate result of the evolution of industries resulting from new social and economic conditions, and of the right of every man to carry on his business as he sees fit, and of lawful competition. On the other hand, when laborers combine to maintain or raise their wages or otherwise to better their condition or to protect themselves from oppression or to attempt to overcome competition with their labor or the products of their labor in order that they may continue to have employment and live, their action, however open, peaceful, and orderly, is branded as a 'conspiracy.' What is 'competition' when done by capital is 'conspiracy' when done by laborers. No amount of verbal dexterity can conceal or justify this glaring discrimination. If the vast aggregation and collective action of capital is not accompanied by a corresponding organization and collective action of labor, capital will speedily become proprietor of the wage earners as well as the recipient of the profits of their labor. This result can only be averted by some sort of organization that will secure the collective action of wage earners. This is demanded, not in the interest of wage earners alone, but by the highest considerations of public policy."

In Vegelahn v. Gunter (167 Mass., 92), Justice Holmes, now of the Supreme Court of the United States, said:

"It is plain from the slightest consideration of practical affairs, or the most superficial reading of industrial history, that free competition means combination and that the organization of the world, now going on so fast, means an ever-increasing might and scope of combination. It seems to me futile to set our faces against this tendency. Whether beneficial on the whole, as I think it is, or detrimental, it is inevitable, unless the fundamental axioms of society and even the fundamental conditions of life are to be changed. One of the eternal conflicts out of which life is made up is that between the effort of every man to get the most he can for his services and that of society, disguised under the name of capital, to get his services for the least possible return. Combination on the one side is potent and powerful. Combination on the other is a fair and equal way. * * * If it be true that the workingmen may combine with a view, among other things, to getting as much as they can for their labor, just as capital may combine with a view to getting the greatest possible return, it must be true that when combined they have the same liberty that combined capital has to support their interest by argument, persuasion, and the bestowal or refusal of those advantages which they otherwise lawfully control."

The logic of Justice Sherwood, of the Supreme Court of Missouri, in Marx & Haas Co. v. Watson (56 L. R. A., 951), appears unanswerable. He discussed the question from a constitutional standpoint, taking for his text the Missouri bill of rights, substantially the same as the first amendment to the Federal Constitution, saying (p. 956):

"The evident idea of that section is penalty or punishment, and not prevention, because if prevention exists, then no opportunity can possibly arise for one becoming responsible by saying, writing, or publishing 'whatever he will on any subject.' The two ideas—the one absolute freedom 'to say, write, or publish whatever he will on any subject,' coupled with responsibility therefor, and the other idea of preventing any such free speech, free writing, or free publication—can not coexist."

The opinion continues, after citing authorities, Federal and State, as follows:

"Section 14, supra, makes no distinction and authorizes no difference to be made by courts or legislatures between a proceeding set on foot to enjoin the publication of a libel and one to enjoin the publication of any other sort or nature, however injurious it may be, or to prohibit the use of free speech or free writing on any subject whatever, because wherever the authority of injunction begins there the right of free speech, free writing, or free publication ends. No halfway house stands on the highway between absolute prevention and absolute freedom."

The fourth clause:

"Or from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value."

In at least two instances State courts (Reynolds v. Davis, 198 Mass., 294, and A. S. Barnes & Co. v. Chicago Typographical Union, 232 Ill., 424) have held that if the purpose of a strike was unlawful the officers and members of unions should be enjoined from giving financial aid in the form of strike benefits in furtherance thereof. But in the only case of the kind disposed of by a Federal court an entirely different conclusion was reached. In A. S. Barnes & Co. v. Berry (157 Fed. R., 883) it was held without exception or qualification that an employer against whom a strike was in operation could not have enjoined the officers of a union from giving its striking members strike benefits. The reason assigned was that—

"the strike benefit fund is created by moneys deposited by the men with the general officers for the support of themselves and families in times of strike, and the court has no more control of it than it would have over deposits made by them in the banks."

This decision is in harmony with two recent English decisions—Denabey, etc., Collieries v. Yorkshire Miners' Assn. (75 L. J. K. B., 384); Lyons v. Wilkins (67 L. J., ch. 383).

The fifth and sixth clauses:

"Or from peaceably assembling at any place in a lawful manner and for lawful purposes; or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto."

After all that can be asserted against the provisions of section 266c, or any provision of the bill elsewhere found has been said, we can truly say that it does not transcend or contravene the clear and conclusive statement of the law as stated in National Fireproofing Co. v. Mason Builders Association (169 Fed. Rep., 260). Delivering the opinion of the court in that case, Judge Noyes said (p. 265):

"As a general rule, it may be stated that when the chief object of a combination is to injure or oppress third persons it is a conspiracy; but that when such injury or oppression is merely incidental to the carrying out of a lawful purpose it is not a conspiracy. Stated in another way: A combination, entered into for the real malicious purpose of injuring a third person in his business or property, may amount to a conspiracy and furnish a ground of action for damages sustained or call for an injunction, even though formed for the ostensible purpose of benefiting its members, and actually operating to some extent to their advantage. But a combination without such ulterior oppressive object entered into merely for the purpose of promoting by lawful means the common interests of its members, is not a conspiracy. A laborer, as well as a builder, trader, or manufacturer, has the right to conduct his affairs in any lawful manner, even though he may thereby injure others. So several laborers and builders may combine for mutual advantage, and so long as the motive is not malicious, the object not unlawful nor oppressive, and the means neither deceitful nor fraudulent, the result is not a conspiracy, although it may necessarily work injury to other persons. The damage to such persons may be serious—it may even extend to their ruin—but if it is inflicted by a combination in the legitimate pursuit of its own affairs is a damnum absque injuria. The damage is present, but the unlawful object is absent. And so the essential question must always be, whether the object of a combination is to do harm to others or to exercise the rights of the parties for their own benefit."

Any attack upon the policy of this section of the bill must be directed at its specific prohibitions; nor will any mere general criticism, or any attack which does not particularize herein, be worthy of serious attention. The ready and perfect defense to all such is at hand, and imposes no difficult task. Is there any reason why the complainant, seeking an injunction against workingmen, should not describe with particularity in his cause of complaint the nature of the threatened injury and the property or property right involved, as in other cases? Is there any reason why an injunction should issue at all involving or growing out of the relation created between employer and employee to prevent the termination of the relation, or advising and persuading others to do so, or to prevent the unrestricted communication and exchange of information between persons, or the giving of aid by financial contributions in any labor affair or dispute? Is there any reason, after a labor dispute has arisen and a socially hostile attitude has been created, for an injunction to prevent abstinence in patronizing or service by one party for the other's benefit, or the exercise of the right of free speech in advising or inducing such abstinence on the part of others? Is there, in short, any good reason why, after a dispute has arisen and the parties are "at arms length," a court of equity should interpose its strong arm merely because such dispute has arisen?

At its hearings the committee had the benefit of learned and illuminating arguments against the several bills. Counsel in opposition were patiently and respectfully heard, and the committee profited largely by having heard them, as is shown by the results of its labors. The bill does not interfere with the Sherman Antitrust Act at all; it leaves the law of conspiracy untouched, and is not open to effective criticism on any constitutional ground. The subject of the constitutionality of such legislation was exhausted at the hearings on the contempt bill (H. R. 22591), returned to the House with a separate report, in which all constitutional objections are fully met.

NO QUESTION OF CONSTITUTIONALITY INVOLVED.

This bill does not, any more than does the contempt bill, invade the jurisdiction of the courts or attempt legislatively to exercise a judicial function. It merely limits and circumscribes the remedy and procedure. While we here enter into no elaborate discussion of the authorities on this topic, yet, for convenience of reference, we insert a synopsis. On point of inconsistency between our theory of government and exercise of arbitrary power see Yick Wo v. Hopkins (118 U. S. Rep., 369). For a case in which Congress was held to have constitutionally exercised power to take away all remedy see Finck v. O'Neill (106 U. S., 272); and for a case where a statute taking away the power to issue an injunction in a certain case wherein the jurisdiction had been previously held and exercised was recognized without question as of binding force see Sharon v. Terry (36 Fed. Rep., 365). For a general statement of the proposition that the inferior courts of the United States are all limited in their nature and constitutions and have not the powers inherent in courts existing by prescription or by the common law see Cary v. Curtiss (3 How. (U. S.), 236, 254). The same principle still more elaborately stated and applied, Ex parte Robinson (19 Wall. (U. S.), 505).

Many decisions on the question of injunctive process and jurisdiction in labor cases are greatly influenced by, and, indeed, sometimes founded upon, precedents established when to be a wage earner was to be a servant whose social and legal status was little above that of slavery. But even England has preceded us in new views and policies herein. The English act of 1906, set forth at length in the hearings, goes further than it has yet been deemed possible to go in this country in relieving labor, and especially organized labor, of legal burdens and discriminations. The Supreme Court has more than once protested against attempts by any branch of the Government to exercise arbitrary power, and the courts should, and probably will, welcome the definite limitations contained in this bill if it should be enacted.

The idea has been advanced, and ably supported in argument, by one of the proponents of this legislation that liberty, and more of it, is safe in the hands of the workingmen of the country. We are convinced of the merit and truth of that contention. The tendency toward freedom and liberation from legal trammels and impediments to progress and to a great social advance is seen in nearly all civilized nations. It is an unpropitious time to oppose a reform like that embodied in this bill, in view of the fact that the abuses of power which it seeks to terminate have been, admittedly, numerous and flagrant.

[H. R. 23635, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
April 22, 1912.

Mr. CLAYTON introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed:

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 263 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows, and that said act be further amended by inserting after section 266 thereof three new sections, to be numbered, respectively, 266a, 266b, 266c, reading as follows:

"SEC. 263. That no injunction, whether interlocutory or permanent, in cases other than those described in section 266 of this title, shall be issued without previous notice and an opportunity to be heard on behalf of the parties to be enjoined, which notice, together with a copy of the bill of complaint or other pleading upon which the application for such injunction will be based, shall be served upon the parties sought to be enjoined a reasonable time in advance of such application. But if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court or judge that immediate and irreparable injury is likely to ensue to the complainant, and that the giving of notice of the application or the delay incident thereto would probably permit the doing of the act sought to be restrained before notice could be served or hearing had thereon, the court or judge may, in his discretion, issue a temporary restraining order without notice. Every such order shall be indorsed with the date and hour of issuance, shall be forthwith entered of record, shall define the injury and state why it is irreparable and why the order was granted without notice, and shall by its terms expire within such time after entry, not to exceed seven days, as the court or judge may fix, unless within the time so fixed the order is extended or renewed for a like period, after notice to those previously served, if any, and for good cause shown, and the reasons for such extension shall be entered of record.

"SEC. 266a. That no restraining order or interlocutory order of injunction shall issue except upon the giving of security by the applicant in such sum as the court or judge may deem proper, conditioned upon the payment of such costs and damages as may be incurred or suffered by any party who may be found to have been wrongfully enjoined or restrained thereby.

"SEC. 266b. That every order of injunction or restraining order shall set forth the reasons for the issuance of the same, shall be specific in terms, and shall describe in reasonable detail, and not by reference to the bill of complaint or other document, the act or acts sought to be restrained; and shall be binding only upon the parties to the suit, their agents, servants, employees, and attorneys, or those in active concert with them, and who shall by personal service or otherwise have received actual notice of the same.

"SEC. 266c. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property or property right must be described with particularity in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

"And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works, or carries on business, or happens to be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working; or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute; or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value; or from peaceably assembling at any place in a lawful manner and for lawful purposes; or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto."

ACTS OF CONGRESS RELATING TO INJUNCTIONS.

Act of September 24, 1789, "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States":

"SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That all the beforementioned courts of the United States shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions and agreeable to the principles and usages of law. And that either of the justices of the Supreme Court, as well as judges of the district courts, shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus for the purpose of an inquiry into the cause of commitment: Provided, That writs of habeas corpus shall in no case extend to prisoners in gaol, unless where they are in custody under or by color of the authority of the United States, or are committed for trial before some court of the same, or are necessary to be brought into court to testify.

* * * * *

"SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That suits in equity shall not be sustained in either of the courts of the United States in any case where plain, adequate, and complete remedy may be had at law."

Act of March 2, 1793, "An act in addition to the act entitled 'An act to establish judicial courts of the United States'":

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That writs of ne exeat and of injunction may be granted by any judge of the Supreme Court in cases where they might be granted by the supreme or a circuit court; but no writ of ne exeat shall be granted unless a suit in equity be commenced, and satisfactory proof shall be made to the court or judge granting the same that the defendant designs quickly to depart from the United States; nor shall a writ of injunction be granted to stay proceedings in any court of a State; nor shall such writ be granted in any case without reasonable previous notice to the adverse party, or his attorney, of the time and place of moving for the same."

Act of June 1, 1872, "An act to further the administration of justice":

"SEC. 7. That whenever notice is given of a motion for an injunction out of a circuit or district court of the United States, the court or judge thereof may, if there appear to be danger of irreparable injury from delay, grant an order restraining the act sought to be enjoined until the decision upon the motion. Such order may be granted with or without security, in the discretion of the court or judge: Provided, That no justice of the supreme court shall hear or allow any application for an injunction or restraining order except within the circuit to which he is allotted, and in causes pending in the circuit to which he is allotted, or in such causes at such place outside of the circuit as the parties may in writing stipulate, except in causes where such application can not be heard by the circuit judge of the circuit or the district judge of the district."

Section 7 of the act of June 1, 1872, above quoted, is carried forward in section 717, section 718, and section 719 of the Revised Statutes (1873 and 1878), which are as follows:

"SEC. 717. Writs of ne exeat may be granted by a justice of the supreme court in cases where they might be granted by the supreme court, and by circuit justice or circuit judge in cases where they might be granted by the circuit court of which he is a judge. But no writ of ne exeat shall be granted unless a suit in equity is commenced and satisfactory proof is made to the court or judge granting the same that the defendant designs quickly to depart from the United States.

"SEC. 718. Whenever notice is given of a motion for an injunction out of a circuit or district court, the court or judge thereof may, if there appears to be danger of irreparable injury from delay, grant an order restraining the act sought to be enjoined until the decision upon the motion; and such order may be granted with or without security in the discretion of the court or judge.

"SEC. 719. Writs of injunction may be granted by any justice of the supreme court in cases where they might be granted by the supreme court, and by any judge of a circuit court in cases where they might be granted by such court. But no justice of the supreme court shall hear or allow any application for an injunction or restraining order in any cause pending in the circuit to which he is allotted, elsewhere than within such circuit, or at such place outside of the same as the parties may stipulate in writing, except when it can not be heard by the circuit judge of the circuit or the district judge of the district. And an injunction shall not be issued by a district judge, as one of the judges of the circuit court, in any case where a party has had a reasonable time to apply to the circuit court for the writ; nor shall any injunction so issued by a district judge continue longer than to the circuit court next ensuing, unless so ordered by the circuit court."

The present law is contained in the following sections of the Judicial Code, approved March 3, 1911, and effective January 1, 1912:

"SEC. 129. Where upon a hearing in equity in a district court, or by a judge thereof in vacation, an injunction shall be granted, continued, refused, or dissolved by an interlocutory order or decree, or an application to dissolve an injunction shall be refused, or an interlocutory order or decree shall be made appointing a receiver, an appeal may be taken from such interlocutory order or decree granting, continuing, refusing, dissolving, or refusing to dissolve an injunction, or appointing a receiver, to the circuit court of appeals, notwithstanding an appeal in such case might, upon final decree under the statutes regulating the same, be taken directly to the supreme court: Provided, That the appeal must be taken within 30 days from the entry of such order or decree, and it shall take precedence in the appellate court; and the proceedings in other respects in the court below shall not be stayed unless otherwise ordered by that court, or the appellate court, or a judge thereof, during the pendency of such appeal: Provided, however, That the court below may, in its discretion, require as a condition of the appeal an additional bond.

* * * * * * *

"SEC. 263. Whenever notice is given of a motion for an injunction out of a district court, the court or judge thereof may, if there appears to be danger of irreparable injury from delay, grant an order restraining the act sought to be enjoined until the decision upon the motion; and such order may be granted with or without security, in the discretion of the court or judge.

* * * * * * *

"SEC. 264. Writs of injunction may be granted by any justice of the supreme court in cases where they might be granted by the supreme court; and by any judge of a district court in cases where they might be granted by such court. But no justice of the supreme court shall hear or allow any application for an injunction or restraining order in any cause pending in the circuit to which he is allotted elsewhere than within such circuit or at such place outside of the same as the parties may stipulate in writing, except when it can not be heard by the district judge of the district. In case of the absence from the district of the district judge, or of his disability, any circuit judge of the circuit in which the district is situated may grant an injunction or restraining order in any case pending in the district court where the same might be granted by the district judge.

* * * * * * *

"SEC. 266. No interlocutory injunction suspending or restraining the enforcement, operation, or execution of any statute of a State by restraining the action of any officer of such State in the enforcement or execution of such statute shall be issued or granted by any justice of the supreme court, or by any district court of the United States, or by any judge thereof, or by any circuit judge acting as district judge, upon the ground of the unconstitutionality of such statute, unless the application for the same shall be presented to a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, or to a circuit or district judge, and shall be heard and determined by three judges, of whom at least one shall be a justice of the supreme court or a circuit judge, and the other two may be either circuit or district judges, and unless a majority of said three judges shall concur in granting such application. Whenever such application as aforesaid is presented to a justice of the supreme court or to a judge he shall immediately call to his assistance to hear and determine the application two other judges: Provided, however, That one of such three judges shall be a justice of the supreme court or a circuit judge. Said application shall not be heard or determined before at least five days' notice of the hearing has been given to the governor and to the attorney general of the State, and to such other persons as may be defendants in the suit: Provided, That if of opinion that irreparable loss or damage would result to the complainant unless a temporary restraining order is granted, any justice of the supreme court or any circuit or district judge may grant such temporary restraining order at any time before such hearing and determination of the application for an interlocutory injunction, but such temporary restraining order shall remain in force only until the hearing and determination of the application for an interlocutory injunction upon notice as aforesaid. The hearing upon such application for an interlocutory injunction shall be given precedence and shall be in every way expedited and be assigned for a hearing at the earliest practicable day after the expiration of the notice hereinbefore provided for. An appeal may be taken direct to the Supreme Court of the United States from the order granting or denying, after notice and hearing, an interlocutory injunction in such case."

[House Report No. 612, part 2, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

REGULATION OF INJUNCTIONS.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following as the views of the minority, to accompany H. R. 23635:

The undersigned members of the Judiciary Committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 23635) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," etc., which bill has been reported favorably, beg leave to submit herewith their views in opposition to the enactment of said measure,

The first section of the bill is intended as a substitute for the existing law on the subject of injunctions as found in section 263 of the Judicial Code, and the subsequent sections are intended to be supplementary to section 266 of the code.

According to the report of the majority of this committee, this bill intends to correct "the too ready issuance of injunctions, or the issuance without proper precautions or safeguards." If the report is predicated upon the "too ready issuance of injunctions," it is singular that it does not disclose a single case upon which the opinion of the majority could be founded. We are well aware of the charges iterated and reiterated before congressional committees alleging abuses in the issuance of injunctions. We have not found any more evidence to support them in the past than we now find in the report of the committee. We thoroughly believe, with the Supreme Court of the United States, "that no injunction ought to be granted except in a case reasonably free from doubt. We think such rule is and will be followed by all the judges of the Federal courts."

The minority members have at all times been willing to assent to a rational proposal to further safeguard the issuance of injunctions against even the possibility of abuse, and have introduced a bill for that purpose; but we can not consent to proposals which would operate to deprive the writ of half its efficiency in all cases and to determine its application in many instances by the character of the parties to the controversy rather than the nature of the wrong which is to be remedied. We think, furthermore, that the majority report is founded upon a misconception of the course of judicial decision respecting statutes regulating the issuance of injunctions, and that the legislation proposed is impracticable, invalid, in the interests of a class rather than of the community, and proposes standards of legality without parallel or precedent in our legislation.

To make our position clearer, we consider the bill in the order pursued in Report No. 612:

I.

Preliminary to a discussion of the bill, the majority gives an historical résumé of legislation respecting notice in injunction cases. We believe essential elements of that history have not received the consideration deserved from the majority, and we must disagree with them respecting conclusions drawn from both the legislation and judicial decisions of the past respecting that legislation.

On the 2d of March, 1793, was enacted legislation of which the following was a part:

"Nor shall any writ of injunction issue in any case without reasonable previous notice to the adverse party or his attorney of the time and place of moving the same." (Ch. 22, vol. 1, U. S. Stat. L., p. 534.)

The majority concludes:

"The will of Congress as thus expressed was completely thwarted and the statute nullified by the peculiar construction placed upon it by the courts."

It appears to us the majority and not the courts, have misconstrued the will of Congress. They overlook, as the court did not, the distinction described in all authoritative textbooks, familiar to every lawyer and pointed out with striking distinctness by the courts, between restraining orders intended to preserve the status quo to protect the subject matter of litigation and the preliminary and final injunctions which are issued, if at all, after hearing upon the application for the equitable remedy. That the statute in question should not be construed to prevent the issuance of restraining orders was natural and inevitable. It was a practice recognized by the English chancery from time immemorial. The early English textbooks speak of it as well understood and essential, as, for instance, Eden on Injunctions, 1821; Adams Equity, 1845.

Had the court construed the act of Congress to forbid the preservation of the subject matter of litigation until the respective rights of the litigants could be adjudicated, it would have obviously given a construction against the very essentials of justice. Indeed, the majority recognizes and admits this by its own proposal, for while it criticizes the construction which permits the issuance of restraining orders without notice under special circumstances it provides in section 263 of its own bill for the doing of the very thing which it criticizes the courts for having done.

We call attention to the English practice, because it was early held respecting the judicial power of the courts of the Union in equity that:

"The usages of the high court of chancery in England whenever the jurisdiction is exercised govern the proceedings. This may be said to be the common law of chancery, and since the organization of the Government it has been observed." (Penn. v. Wheeling, etc., Bridge Co., 13 How., 563; Meade v. Beale, 1 Campbell's Reports, 339, C. C. M. D. Tawney, 1850; Loring et al. v. Marsh, 2 Clifford's Reports, 469.)

Thus, the courts did not "get around" the statute, as is suggested by the majority, but construed it in accordance with an immemorial practice of English jurisprudence which recognized the necessity of issuing restraining orders under special circumstances that the court might preserve the status quo, protect the subject matter of litigation, and preserve from destruction that upon which it was to pass judgment.

The report implies that the case of New York v. Connecticut (4 Dall., 1) upheld a construction which forbade the issuance of even restraining orders without notice. That issue is not presented in that case, decided in 1799. The practice was first recognized four years before in the case of Schermerhorn v. L'Espenasse (2 Dall., 360). In this case the defendants, merchants of Amsterdam, had executed to the complainant power of attorney to receive for his own use the interest due on $180,000 of certificates of the United States, bearing interest at 6 per cent from the 1st of January, 1788, to the 31st of December, 1790, amounting to $32,400. Notwithstanding this assignment, the defendants, on the 16th of June, 1792, received certificates for the interest and funded the amount at 3 per cent in their own names. The bill prayed relief according to the equity of the case and a restraining order to prevent the defendants from transferring the stock or receiving the principal or interest. On the bill exhibited of the power of attorney and affidavits to the effect that the stock was registered in the name of the defendants on the books of the Treasurer the restraining order was granted. No subpœna was served until Mr. Lewis, on behalf of the defendants, moved for a rule to show cause why the injunction should not be dissolved. The motion was refused. An examination of the record discloses that Mr. Lewis, counsel for the defendants, supported his motion for dissolution on two grounds:

"That the injunction was issued irregularly, as there was no affidavit made of the truth of the allegations contained in the bill."

In supporting this he said:

"He did not object because the injunction was issued before a subpœna was served, as there were various cases in which justice could not otherwise be obtained."

This proceeding was had two years after the passage of the statute of 1793 before a justice of the Supreme Court who had been a Member of the Congress which had enacted the statute; the hearing was held in a building adjoining that in which the act was passed and in the same district where the Congress was sitting. It demonstrates as no other case can the well-recognized equity practice in relation to temporary restraining orders, and shows the construction placed upon the statute by the profession and the court. In the meantime the practice of issuing restraining orders without notice under special circumstances of necessity was approved through the exercise of the power by the highest authority, including various justices of the circuit and district courts and Chief Justice Marshall (who is observed to issue an ex parte restraining order to prevent moneys alleged to have been improperly allowed by an administrator from being taken out of the country). (Green et al. v. Hanberry's Executors, 2 Brockenbrough's Reports, 405, Nov., 1839; Love v. Fendall's Trustees, 1 Cranch C. C., 34; Marsh et al. v. Bennett, 5 McLean, 117; Crane v. McCoy, 1 Bond's Reports, 422; Mowrey v. Indianapolis & C. R. Co., 17 Fed. Cas., 930.)

Too much space would be taken by the enumeration of cases of this character, and those cited are merely offered as examples.

Finally, during the debate upon the act of 1872, now section 263 of the Judicial Code, we find two of the most distinguished lawyers of the Senate expressing the recognized practice as follows:

"Mr. CARPENTER. I understand if any judge having the jurisdiction by law to grant an injunction has presented to him a bill in equity, fortified with proofs which entitle the party by the acknowledged and usual practice of a court of equity to have an injunction, the judge has no discretion to deny it.

"Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think that elementary provision of the law even I may have been presumed to have heard and known of.

"Mr. CARPENTER. Therefore I was astonished to hear the Senator deny it.

"Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I did not deny it." (46 Congressional Globe, p. 2492.)

Thus we find the practice respecting restraining orders recognized by Congress, by the courts, and the profession throughout the history of our Government and its necessity appreciated by the majority from its incorporation in this bill. Indeed, we believe the right to issue a restraining order upon a proper showing of its necessity to protect a right of a pecuniary nature against irreparable damage is an essential part of the judicial power in equity. If a suitor over whom a court has jurisdiction by a bill in that court discloses a state of facts where irreparable harm is threatened and where, if notice were given, irreparable damage would be done before hearing could be had or decree entered, were deprived by the legislature of the right to such a remedy, we believe it would be equivalent to a legislative determination in advance that under no circumstances can a plaintiff disclose a threatened irreparable injury without adequate remedy at law demanding immediate equitable intervention. If the Congress undertakes arbitrarily to determine in advance what a suitor would otherwise be entitled to as due process of law in a court of equity, we believe he would be deprived of a guaranteed constitutional right.

The first section of the bill, with one material exception, is almost an exact copy of a bill introduced in the Sixty-first Congress, known as the Moon bill. This bill was reintroduced in the present Congress, and was supported by the entire Republican membership of the Judiciary Committee.

The exception referred to has reference to the provision for the expiration of a restraining order granted by the court without notice. The Moon bill provided that the order should expire "within such time after service is made or notice given, which shall be made or given as speedily as possible, not to exceed seven days, as the judge or court shall fix." The proposed bill provides that "it shall expire at such time after entry as the court or judge shall fix, not to exceed seven days," etc.

A restraining order is of no effect until served, and under such a provision it would be only necessary for those having knowledge of the application to avoid service for seven days after the issuance of the order to defeat its purpose. We can conceive circumstances in which a few who might be served would notify other defendants to avoid it and on failure to make the order effective by service within seven days it would be necessary to give notice to all previously served before an extension of further time could be had. We can conceive of no more certain method of depriving a suitor of essential equitable protection. Many judicial districts of our country administer justice over vast areas in which the material circumstances of life must be taken into consideration. The proposal of this section is general. It applies to all forms of litigation, and in view of the physical as well as the personal difficulties attending the service of restraining orders under some circumstances we can not but believe that not only would many individual suitors suffer grievous injury, but we can from our public service and professional experience conceive many circumstances in which the public interest would be seriously jeopardized. All of these difficulties would be overcome if the restraining order should date from the time of service instead of the time of its entry.

II.

Section 266A provides that no restraining or interlocutory order shall issue except upon the giving of security against cost or damage.

Under the present practice this is within the discretion of the court, and while we should not be disposed to disagree with such a suggestion, we must again note that no reason is given for the suggested change which implies a failure upon the part of the courts to properly exercise this discretion. No evidence to this effect has been at any time submitted to the committee, nor do the majority offer any evidence to that effect as a reason for their action.

III.

Section 266B requires every restraining order or every injunctive order "to set forth the reasons for the issuance of the same to be specific in terms and describe in reasonable detail, and not by reference to the bill of complaint or other document the act or acts sought to be restrained"; it binds only the parties to the suit, "their agents, servants, employees, and attorneys or those in active concert with them, and who shall by personal services or otherwise have received actual notice of the same." This section is of general application. In support of this provision the majority point out that it is to be a safeguard against "dragnet or blanket injunctions," by which parties may be punished for contempt after "only constructive notice, equivalent in most cases to none at all."

Again, the majority asserts conditions as a basis for proposed legislation which are both unproven and unprovable. Nothing is clearer in the field of jurisprudence than the requirement that a respondent on a contempt charge must have actual notice of the existence of an order which he is accused of violating and that the order must have been unmistakably brought to his attention. (Bessette v. Conkey, 194 U. S.) All the Debbs cases, both in the circuit and district courts and on appeal, actually confirm this statement. The majority offer in proof of the necessity of their proposal merely an implication unwarrantedly reflecting upon the judiciary and without supporting proof of any character.

They have, moreover, properly provided in section 266 that every restraining order issued shall be accompanied by an entry stating the reasons for its issuance. It would be a useless waste of time to again set forth the reasons for the issuance of the order in the order itself, as is required by section 266B. Complaints are heard on every side against cumbersome and delaying procedure. This proposal multiplies the delays, difficulties, and inconveniences of procedure indefinitely. It requires every order to be a history, to repeat in irrelevant and cumbersome detail all the preliminary pleadings, and instead of enlightening the parties against whom it was issued the form suggested and the procedure prescribed would increase his confusion and doubt.

The majority point out that there is "no Federal statute to govern either the matter of making or form and contents of orders in injunctions," thereby inferring that this entire matter is left to the discretion or judgment of the judge granting the injunction. In this statement they entirely overlook the rules in equity of the Supreme Court of the United States binding upon all inferior Federal courts, prescribing with great minuteness and changed from time to time in accordance with the teaching of experience the forms of injunctive orders and forbidding the ceaseless repetition in decrees and orders of the contents of bills of complaint.

The effect of section 266B is to abolish the many rules in equity of the Supreme Court in conflict with it, representing the professional experience of a century, and amended from time to time to shorten procedure, increase the convenience, and protect the rights of litigants in the courts of the United States. The majority says section 266 does not change the best practice with respect to orders, but imposes the duty upon the courts in mandatory form to conform to correct rules as already established by judicial precedent. We respectfully submit that the equity rules of the Supreme Court express correct judicial precedents and that the majority have apparently overlooked this important fact.

The bill as reported would withdraw the application of the restraining order from parties not named in it and not in agreement with the parties named who may on their own initiative undertake its violation. Such cases are not uncommon. If the majority intend to exempt such violations of the order, they have created an unusual and remarkably privileged class of lawbreakers; if not, we are unable to discern the intention expressed in the limitation "in active concert with them."

IV.

The two paragraphs of section 266C must be read in connection with each other or their purpose and meaning are lost. The first paragraph provides that no judge or court of the United States shall issue any restraining order or injunction "in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving or growing out of a dispute concerning the terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right," etc. If this section is intended to withdraw civil rights from equitable protection in this class of cases, we must disapprove it as an evident effort to deny such protection as is given to civil rights in all other classes of cases, since it is axiomatic that it is the office of equity to protect by injunction, under proper circumstances, civil and even personal as well as property rights. We object to the implication contained in emphasizing controversies between employers and employees, or between employees or persons employed and seeking employment, and if the majority intends by this to indicate that such rights are to have less or different protection from the same rights when involving controversies of another kind we must emphatically disagree with the principle implied, for in this country remedies are to be predicated at all times upon the character of the rights which are threatened, and not upon the class or nature of the persons involved in the controversy.

We do not comment upon the many cases cited by the learned members of the majority in support of their views upon equity pleadings in this connection. We quite agree with the correctness of such decisions, but we draw from them quite a different conclusion from that implied by the majority. We think they prove what the majority evidently adduces them to disprove. To us they are evidence that the pleadings required with such particularity in the special class of cases involved in section 266C are required generally in all applications for equitable intervention. The majority are thus seen to be offering as proof of the need of special legislation for pleadings in a particular class of cases the fact that the courts have substantially required such conditions and pleadings in all classes of cases of which the kind enumerated are a part.

The second paragraph of section 266C contains to our mind the most vicious proposal of the whole bill. It enumerates certain specific acts and provides that no restraining order or injunction shall prohibit the doing of them. Most of the acts thus recited are in themselves not amenable to the injunction process under existing law and practice. No court does or would enjoin them, but to declare by law that these acts should under no circumstances be restrained, we do not hesitate to say is a proposal without precedent in the legislative history of this country. No legislature has ever proposed that any act however innocent itself should be sanctified irrespective of the motive or purpose of the actor. "No conduct," says Mr. Justice Holmes in Aiken v. Wisconsin (195 U. S., 194), "has such an absolute privilege as to justify all possible schemes of which it may be a part. The most innocent and constitutionally protected of acts or omissions may be made a step in a criminal plot, and if it is a step in a plot, neither its innocence nor the Constitution is sufficient to prevent the punishment of the plot by law."

The majority have quoted various decisions in which particular acts under the pleadings presented to the court were held lawful and their prohibition denied. The same acts under other circumstances have been held unlawful and enjoined by the very courts, and in the course of the very decisions which the majority cites. Thus, in Arthur v. Oakes (63 Fed. Rep., 310), Mr. Justice Harlan is quoted to sustain the proposition that no man can by injunction be required to perform personal service for another, and in that decision Justice Harlan eliminated from the injunction the words "and from so quitting the service of the said receivers with or without notice as to cripple the property or prevent or hinder the operation of said railroad." The majority must observe, however, that Mr. Justice Harlan likewise held, "But different considerations must control in respect to the words in the same paragraph of the writs of injunction, and from combining and conspiring to quit with or without notice the service of said receivers with the object and intention of crippling the property in their custody or embarrassing the operation of said railroad." Thus, the same act of quitting is lawful under one set of circumstances and unlawful under another, because the concerted action in the first instance, in the opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan, "is a very different matter from a combination and conspiracy among employees with the object and intent, not simply of quitting the service of the receivers because of the reduction of wages, but of crippling the property in their hands and embarrassing the operation of the railroad."

The majority undertakes to prescribe a set rule forbidding under any circumstances the enjoining of certain acts which may or may not be actuated by a malicious motive or be done for the purpose of working an unlawful injury or interfering with constitutional rights of employer or employee. In the same opinion Mr. Justice Harlan points out the impossibility of prescribing a set rule of this character and says, "The authorities all agree that a court of equity should not hesitate to use its power when the circumstances of the particular case in hand require it to be done in order to protect rights of property against irreparable damage by wrongdoers. It is as Justice Story said, 'because of the varying circumstances of cases that courts of equity constantly decline to lay down any rule which shall limit their power and discretion as to the particular cases in which such injunction shall be granted or withheld.'" and the authority proceeds, "there is wisdom in this course, for it is impossible to foresee all the exigencies of society which may require their aid and assistance to protect rights or redress wrongs. The jurisdiction of these courts thus operating by special injunction is manifestly indispensable for the purposes of social justice in a great variety of cases and therefore should be fostered and upheld by a steady confidence." (Story, Equity Jurisprudence, sec. 959B; Arthur v. Oakes, 63 Fed. Rep., 328.)

Among the acts which the second paragraph of section 266C declares shall not be restrained is to prohibit any person or persons to terminate any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor or from recommending or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; of peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working, or from ceasing to patronize or employ any party to such dispute or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do, etc.

While many of these acts are in themselves entirely harmless and would never be enjoined by any court, yet under certain circumstances the same acts might become a weapon of lawless and destructive industrial warfare demanding the protection of the courts, this section would prevent the issuance of the injunction in the Debs case (In re Debs, 158 U. S., 564); it would prevent the issuance of the injunction in Toledo & Ann Arbor v. Pennsylvania Co. (54 Fed., 730); it would prevent the issuance of any injunction to restrain either workmen or employers who were the objects of the most vicious form of boycott that has been passed upon by the courts or can be devised by the ingenuity of boycotters. It changes the remedies by which the Sherman Act may be enforced, inasmuch as if any of these acts enumerated in section 266C were the means employed to enforce the restraint of trade or to damage the interstate business of any individual or corporation no injunction could be obtained either by a private individual or by the Government against such acts.

In the Debs case a combination sought to paralyze the railroads of the United States and prevent the carrying of the mail until the railroad companies would agree not to haul Pullman cars because of a controversy between the Pullman Co. and certain of its employees, who were not in the employ nor in any way related to the railroad companies. It is true there were acts of violence, but the general scheme was one of persuading all employees of the railroad companies to quit until the demands of the boycotters and strikers had been complied with. In the Toledo & Ann Arbor case the famous rule 12 of the brotherhood provided that none of its members should handle the cars of any carrier with which members of the brotherhood were in a dispute. In that case the brotherhood employees of the Pennsylvania refused to handle cars of the Toledo & Ann Arbor because of a dispute between that road and some of the brotherhood, and they threatened to quit the service of the Pennsylvania road unless it agreed to violate the provisions of the interstate-commerce act by not affording equal facilities to the cars of another road. No violence was threatened. The brotherhood merely undertook to "peacefully persuade" the Pennsylvania Co. not to handle the cars of the other road under a threat of leaving their service—a thing which they had a perfect right to do to better their own condition, but not for the purpose of compelling the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. to violate the law.

The majority report quotes at length from the case of Pickett v. Walsh (192 Mass., 572), "and regret the necessity of limiting the quotations, because the whole opinion could be studied with profit." We agree with the majority that the whole opinion could have been studied with profit, since it condemns forms of "peaceful persuasion" from which the majority would withdraw equitable intervention. Speaking of the case before it, it says: "It is a refusal to work for A, with whom the strikers have no dispute, because A works for B, with whom the strikers have a dispute, for the purpose of forcing A to force B to yield to the strikers' demands. * * * It is a combination by the union to obtain a decision in their favor by forcing other persons who have no interest in the dispute to force the employer to decide the dispute in their favor. Such a strike is an interference with the right of the plaintiffs to pursue their calling as they think best. In our opinion organized labor's right to coercion or compulsion is limited to strikes against the persons with whom the person has a trade dispute; or, to put it in another way, we are of the opinion that a strike against A, with whom the strikers have no trade dispute, to compel A to force B to the strikers' demands is unjustifiable interference with the right of A to carry on his calling as he thinks best. Only two cases to the contrary have come to our attention, namely, Bohm Manufacturing Co. v. Hollis (54 Minn., 223) and Jeans Clothing Co. v. Watson (168 Mo., 133)."

This case which the majority believe could be "studied with profit" is squarely against the proposal of their bill, and the two cases alluded to as being the only ones known to the court contrary to such view, for both have been overruled. Bohm Manufacturing Co. (54 Minn., 223) was overruled in Gray v. Building Trades Council (91 Minn., 171). The second case is alluded to by the majority of the committee in support of its contentions, and the majority declare the logic of the court in that case "appears unanswerable." This "unanswerable" logic was overruled by the Supreme Court of Missouri in Lohse Patent Door Co. v. Fuel (215 Mo., 421).

The majority report also quotes in support of their contention from Vagelahm v. Gunter (167 Mass., 92), saying, "Justice Holmes, now of the Supreme Court of the United States, delivered the opinion." The opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Allen and is squarely against the contention of the majority, Mr. Justice Holmes having delivered a dissenting opinion, in which he stood alone. The majority have been driven to the necessity of quoting from other dissenting opinions in support of their opposition, and to these we do not deem it necessary to give attention.

It is said by the majority that no question of constitutionality is involved. We submit that if the measure is to be construed, as it evidently is, to prevent the application of injunctive relief to certain acts in disputes between employer and employee which may be part of a scheme or plan to work irreparable injury, which acts could be enjoined in any other department of litigation, it is obvious that the parties affected would be denied the equal protection of the law and due process of law, coming well within the rule laid down in Connelly v. The Union Sewer Pipe Co. (184 U. S., 540); Goldberg v. Stablemen's Union (149 Cal., 429); Pierce v. Stablemen's Union (156 Cal., 70); and Niagara Fire Insurance Co. v. Cornell (110 Fed., 816).

We do not consider the English act of 1906, which is quoted by the majority as a precedent for some of its proposals. There is no parallel whatever between the conditions at which the English act is aimed and the fundamental restrictions of the organic law of this country having no similitude in the constitution of the British Empire. The peculiar privileges conferred upon trades-unions by the English act of 1906 are accompanied by disabilities and criminal provisions of so drastic a nature that if they were offered as any part of the legislation of this country we should deem it our duty to oppose them in the interest of all workingmen.

We agree with the majority that "liberty and more of it is safe in the hands of the workingmen of the country." We are convinced of the merit and truth of that contention. We do not, however, believe that liberty is advanced in the person of any citizen by stripping him of remedial protection through processes which have received the deliberate and mature approval of the English-speaking race during all the centuries of its history. We can not believe that the due protection of person and property under constitutional guaranties and by remedies tested by time is "an impediment to progress," or that the destruction of the essential remedies by which person and property receive protection is "a great social advance." We believe with the President of the United States, in a famous statement made by him many years since to the American Bar Association, "It will not be surprising if the storm of abuse heaped upon the Federal courts and the political strength of Federal groups, whose plans of social reforms have met obstructions in these tribunals, shall lead to serious efforts, through legislation, to cut down their jurisdiction and cripple their efficiency. If this comes, then the responsibility for its effects, whether good or bad, must be not only with those who urge the change, but also with those who do not strive to resist its coming." (Address to American Bar Association at Detroit, 1895.)

FRANCIS H. DODDS.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, as I have only one more speech and have only nine and one-half minutes remaining, I am going to reserve that for my good friend from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] after the expiration of the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has 47 minutes remaining.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to all that has been said on this bill. Gentlemen on that side of the House have devoted the entire time allotted to them to the discussion of that part of the bill which is contained in the substitute. Gentlemen should understand that the bill which is offered by the minority as a substitute is contained almost verbatim, with a single excepton, in the first paragraph of the bill that is offered by the majority. I submit to you, gentlemen, that every argument used on that side of the House has been in favor of that provision of the bill for which the minority stands and which they have presented to the House in the substitute bill. And they have made a splendid defense of that part of the bill. They have confined their time and their talk to a discussion of the bill about which there is no controversy. But in the beginning I want to take issue with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], when he says that Republican Presidents have, in messages and in public utterances, indorsed the legislation proposed by the majority. In no message sent to Congress by any Republican President, and, so far as I know, in no public utterance, has any Republican President ever indorsed the provisions contained in the majority bill, excepting the provisions contained in the first section.

I agree wth the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] that the provision in this bill providing that no temporary restraining order shall be issued without notice, except in cases where delay would result in irreparable injury to property or property rights, is a wise provision and ought to be placed upon the statute books. There is no controversy with the gentlemen on that side of the House with reference to the question as to a short time for final hearing when injunctions have been issued. It is purely a Republican proposition.

As the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] stated, I did introduce into this House four years ago a bill providing for those very things. President Roosevelt and President Taft in almost every message they have sent to Congress have urged upon Congress the wisdom of making clear and explicit the provisions of law relating to notice and to early trial, and that is the proposition which we offer to this House in the substitute bill.

None of the gentlemen on that side of the House have undertaken to defend the last two paragraphs of this bill. No one, except the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] has even tried to justify that part of the bill. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] said nothing in favor of those provisions of the bill, and which, I submit to you, in spite of what those gentlemen have said, constitute a radical change in the law of the land.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. The gentleman refers to the fact that "the gentleman from West Virginia" said nothing in justification of the last section of the bill. The gentleman, of course, will be fair enough to admit that the gentleman's time expired just as he began to discuss that section?

Mr. STERLING. I think that is true, Mr. Speaker, but the gentleman had 30 minutes, and he devoted the 30 minutes to defending the provisions of the bill about which there is no controversy and on which everybody, so far as I know, agree. He did it extremely well, too. So well that I shall say but little in regard to the substitute bill, which is the same as that part of the majority bill which gentlemen have so ably supported by their argument. It seems to me if he had any defense to make of the provisions of the bill that are in controversy he would have devoted at least a part of his time to that defense.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. STERLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I take for granted that the gentleman heard the speech made by his colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON].

Mr. STERLING. I did, every word of it.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Did he gather from that speech of his colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON] was not attacking the first three sections of the bill, and they were not controverted by him?

Mr. STERLING. I dislike to take any of my time to reply to that question, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania said one thing with reference to the first section of their bill, and that is the exception that I noted. The gentleman from Pennsylvania spoke of the fact that the provision of the bill offered by the majority provided the seven days should begin to run at the time the entry was made, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania insisted that the seven days should begin to run from the time service is had. That is the criticism he offered on that bill.

Now, it is well to know, gentlemen, what the law is in this country before we undertake to determine whether this bill changes it or whether it ought to be changed. And I propose to read from a decision of one of the courts of the United States what I believe to be a clear, explicit statement of the law and of all the law on this question that is involved in the last two paragraphs of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I read from the case of the Union Pacific Railroad Co. v. Ruef. The decision is rendered by Judge McPherson in the district of Nebraska, and it is contained in volume 120 of the Federal Reporter. I read, beginning on page 113. I do not read it because it is the decision of Judge McPherson, but I read it because it is the law as it has been enunciated by the Federal judges almost universally, and he states it so clearly and in such excellent language, that I read from this decision rather than go through the numerous other decisions that cover the same point in substantially the same language. The judge says:

I believe, and that without a doubt, that, in so far as propositions are involved in this case, the law is as follows:

(1) The defendants acted within their right when they went out on a strike. Whether with good cause, or without any cause or reason, they had the right to quit work for the Union Pacific Railroad Co., and their reasons for quitting work were reasons they need not give to anyone. And that they all went out in a body, by agreement or preconcerted arrangement, does not militate against them or affect this case in any way.

(2) Such rights are reciprocal, and the company had the right to discharge any or all of the defendants, with or without cause, and it can not be inquired into as to what the cause was.

(3) It is immaterial whether the defendants are not now in the service of the company because of a strike or a lockout.

(4) The defendants have the right to combine and work together in whatsoever way they believe will increase their earnings, shorten their hours, lessen their labor, or better their condition, and it is for them, and them only, to say whether they will work by the day or by piecework. All such is part of their liberty. And they can so conclude as individuals, or as organizations, or as unions.

(5) And the right is also reciprocal. The railroad company has the right to have its work done by the premium or piece system, without molestation or interference by defendants or others. This is liberty for the company, and the company alone has the right to determine as to that matter.

(6) When the defendants went on a strike, or when put out on a lockout, their relations with the company were at an end; they were no longer employees of the company; and the places they once occupied in the shops were no longer their places, and never can be again, excepting by mutual agreement between the defendants and the company.

(7) No one of the defendants can be compelled by any law or by any order of any court to again work for the company on any terms or under any conditions.

(8) The company can not be compelled to employ again any of defendants or any other person, by any law or by any order of any court on any terms or under any conditions.

(9) Each, all, and every of the foregoing matters between the company and the defendants are precisely the same, whether applied to the company or to the defendants.

(10) The company has the right to employ others to take the places once filled by defendants; and in employing others the defendants are not to be consulted, and it is of no lawful concern to them, and they can make no lawful complaint by reason thereof. And it makes no difference whether such new employees are citizens of Omaha or of some other city or State. A citizen of Chicago, or from any State in the Union, has the same rights as to work in Omaha as has a citizen of Omaha.

(11) Defendants have the right to argue or discuss with the new employees the question whether the new employees should work for the company. They have the right to persuade them if they can. But in presenting the matter they have no right to use force or violence. They have no right to terrorize or intimidate the new employees. The new employees have the right to come and go as they please, without fear or molestation, and without being compelled to discuss this or any other question, and without being guarded or picketed; and persistent and continued and objectionable persuasion by numbers is of itself intimidating and not allowable.

(12) Picketing in proximity to the shops or elsewhere on the streets of the city, if, in fact, it annoys or intimidates the new employees, is not allowable. The streets are for public use, and the new employee has the same right, neither more nor less, to go back and forth, freely and without molestation and without being harassed by so-called arguments, and without being picketed, as has a defendant or other person. In short, the rights of all parties are one and the same.

Now, gentlemen, that is the law in the United States. Who would change it? Is there anyone who will say that that law does not extend to every man equal rights, equal privileges, and equal opportunities? It is based on that principle, fundamental to our American institutions, that all men are equal before the law. He who would change its provisions must justify by good and sufficient reasons if he hopes for the approval of the American people.

Some gentlemen on that side urge that this bill makes no changes in the law as now administered. Indeed, the majority report from the Committee on the Judiciary suggests that it makes no change in the existing law. Then why pass it? Why encumber the statutes with legislation that makes no change in the laws as they are now? It is not sufficient to say that some of the judges have misconstrued the law as laid down in the decision from which I read. Is there any assurance that judges will not misconstrue the law as you offer it in this bill? Here is a plain, explicit provision of the law, which admits of no possibility of a doubtful construction. Courts will differ in their opinion as to the meaning of this bill. Gentlemen on the floor of this House honestly disagree as to its meaning and effect, and there will be judges who honestly construe it one way and other judges who will honestly construe it another way, and we will then have a diversity of judicial construction of the law which is now plain and explicit.

I say this bill does change the law. It takes away from both the employer and the employee the right of protection by injunction which they now enjoy.

In order to get it into the RECORD, I desire to read a paragraph from the Republican platform on this question, as follows:

We believe, however, that the rules of procedure in the Federal courts with respect to the issuance of the writ of injunction should be more accurately defined by statute, and that no injunction or temporary restraining order should be issued without notice, except where irreparable injury would result from delay, in which case a speedy hearing should be granted thereafter.

The substitute which we have offered is in strict harmony with that provision of the Republican platform. It is in strict harmony with the platform on which every Republican was elected two years ago. It is the fulfillment of the pledge we then made to the country. It is in strict accord with the letter of acceptance of President Taft and with every suggestion made by Mr. Roosevelt when he was President of the United States on this subject of injunctions. No man on the floor of this House can say that either of those gentlemen ever at any time made utterances in favor of legislation such as is provided in this bill.

In order to settle that question, Mr. Speaker, I desire to read from a letter written by Mr. Roosevelt when he was President to Secretary Knox. It is dated October 21, 1908. It was during the last presidential campaign.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question right in that connection?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. CLAYTON. The letter which the gentleman is about to read is a letter that former President Roosevelt wrote in reference to what was known as the Pearre bill, is it not?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. CLAYTON. And that is not the bill which is now under consideration.

Mr. STERLING. Let us see about that.

Mr. CLAYTON. This is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. STERLING. We will discuss that proposition too. What was known as the Pearre bill was at that time pending before the Judiciary Committee. It had been before the committee for two or three sessions, and I think has been before the committee ever since either under the name of the Pearre bill or the Wilson bill. After Mr. Pearre retired from Congress the bill came before the Judiciary Committee again, having been introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON].

Now, the majority of the committee had started in to revise the Wilson bill, and the Wilson bill is in substance the same as the old Pearre bill. The Pearre bill provided for three things, and three things only that are material to this discussion. First, it related only to labor disputes; second, it provided that no court should hold that the right to do business in a certain place or in a certain way was a property right to be protected by injunction; third, it abrogated the offense of conspiracy. Now, that is what the Pearre bill provided and it is what the Wilson bill provides, and it is what this bill provides. The only improvement in this bill over the Pearre bill is that paragraph which contains the provisions covered by the bill which I have offered as a substitute.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. The gentleman has said that not in any message of either President Taft or President Roosevelt was there any expression which justifies the course pursued in this bill. I take it the gentleman is familiar with the message of President Roosevelt of January 21, 1908.

Mr. STERLING. I have read it, but I do not want the gentleman to read it now in my time.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. I wanted to ask whether the gentleman would give me time to read it.

Mr. STERLING. No; I will not give the gentleman time to read it now. The gentleman has called the attention of the House to it, and Members can read it for themselves. I propose to give to the House Mr. Roosevelt's views on the Pearre bill in his letter to Secretary Knox, which I mentioned a moment ago. Before reading it I want to say this: It is true that the bill which is now before the House does not expressly provide that no court shall hold that the right to do business is a property right, but it does provide a method—a legalized method—whereby that right may be destroyed, whether you call it a property right or whether you call it a personal right. And so I say, so far as the effect of this bill is concerned, it is on all fours with the old Pearre bill, that Mr. Roosevelt referred to in this letter and which he severely condemns.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman be definite and state what part of the bill he conceives does make that provision?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; I will later on. This is a very long letter, and I shall read only three paragraphs:

> There is no need of generalities or of vague expressions of sympathy for labor. Let Mr. Bryan simply confine himself to the anti-injunction plank of his own platform and tell us publicly, definitely, and clearly whether he accepts or rejects the statement of Mr. Gompers that this plank pledges him to the principles of the bill for which Mr. Gompers stands, and whether, if elected, he will endeavor to have this proposition enacted into law.

The bill that Mr. Roosevelt refers to is the Pearre bill; and I assert here again, and make it as emphatic as I can, that this bill contains practically every bad feature that the old Pearre bill contained.

How can you gentlemen suggest that President Taft and Mr. Roosevelt had indorsed legislation of this kind? In this letter Mr. Roosevelt calls on Mr. Bryan to say to the people of the country whether or not he will stand for the proposition that is contained in the old Pearre bill, and, so far as I know, your candidate for President, Mr. Bryan, never said that he would stand for the propositions therein contained.

He goes on:

> This is asked honestly in the interest of that large voting public which believes sincerely in the promotion of every legitimate right and interest of labor; but which believes also that from the standpoint of the best interest of labor it neither requires nor is entitled to more than justice, and that the right to destroy business should not be formally recognized in the law of the land.
> REALIZES RIGHT TO SPEAK.
> I feel that I have the right to speak frankly in this matter, because throughout my term as President it has been my constant object to do everything in my power, both by administrative action and by endeavoring to secure legislative action, to advance the cause of labor, protect it from unjust aggression, and secure to it its legitimate rights. I have accomplished something; I hope to accomplish more before I leave office; and I have taken special and peculiar interest in Mr. Taft's candidacy because I believe that of all the men in this country he is the man best qualified for continuing the work of securing to the wage-workers of the country their full rights.
> I will do everything in my power for the wage workers of the country except to do what is wrong. I will do wrong for no man; and with all the force in my power I solemnly warn the laboring man of this country that any public man who advocates doing wrong in their interests can not be trusted by them, and this whether his promise to do wrong is given knowing that it is wrong or because of a levity and lack of consideration which make him willing to promise anything without counting the cost if thereby support at the moment is to be purchased.
> WILL FIGHT ABUSES.
> Just as I have fought hard to bring about in the fullest way the recognition of the right of the employee to be amply compensated for injury received in the course of his duty, so I have fought hard and shall continue to fight hard to do away with all abuses in the use of the power of injunction. I will do everything I can to see that the power of injunction is not used to oppress laboring men. I will endeavor to secure them full and equal justice. Therefore, in the interest of all good citizens, be they laboring men, business men, professional men, farmers, or members of any other occupation, so long as they have in their souls the principles of sound American citizenship, I denounce as wicked the proposition to secure a law which, according to the explicit statement of Mr. Gompers, is to prevent the courts from effectively interfering with riotous violence when the object is to destroy a business, and which will legalize a blacklist and the secondary boycott, both of them the apt instruments of unmanly persecution.

Those are the views of Mr. Roosevelt on the legislation which you propose, and if gentlemen can get comfort from them they are welcome to it.

Now, this bill provides that peaceful picketing shall be allowed. Peaceful picketing is now allowed. The law which I read from the decision of Judge McPherson, reiterated by the courts of this country over and over again, holds that peaceful picketing is lawful.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, if it will not interrupt the gentleman I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. STERLING. I will yield.

Mr. CLAYTON. I observe that the gentleman has read what former President Roosevelt said in behalf of President Taft. Does the gentleman know whether former President Roosevelt still entertains that opinion?

Mr. STERLING. Oh, the gentleman can decide that question for himself. The gentleman can not divert me from the proposition now before the House by such a question.

Mr. CLAYTON. One more question.

Mr. STERLING. I will have to ask the gentleman to desist now.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not wish to embarrass the gentleman.

Mr. STERLING. The gentleman will not embarrass me, but he is taking up my time.

Mr. CLAYTON. Oh, if the gentleman does not wish to yield.

Mr. STERLING. I will yield to the gentleman for one more question.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would like to know whether ex-President Roosevelt has changed his views in regard to the labor legislation or the labor question. He has changed his views in regard to President Taft.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I submit that the gentleman from Alabama is consuming my time unnecessarily.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MARTIN of Colorado). The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, this bill, while it in terms permits peaceful picketing, which is already the law, also in terms admits of another kind of picketing, which is unlawful. I hope no man in this House, on that side or on this, will get the idea, whether he be, as some claim they are, special representatives of organized labor or not—I hope they will not get the idea that this bill is aimed only at the employer of labor in this country. It strikes just as fiercely and just as hard at the rights of the laboring men. This bill provides that one or any number of men can go to the home, to the very fireside of another, with or without his consent, for the purpose, as they call it, of conducting a peaceful picket. I say to you that that will do away with the protection that a large majority of the laboring men of the United States now have under the law of injunctions. It is just as much a violation of the rights of the men that labor as it is of the men that employ labor. This bill provides that any number of persons, who happen to disagree with another who desires to work, may go to his home or to the place where he works at the counter or in the shop or anywhere he happens to be, whether he consents or not, to prevail on him to cease work, and that act on the part of these fellow workmen can not be enjoined under this bill for the protection of the rights of the man that seeks to labor, the man that wants to labor. It deprives him of the protection of that right as well as the right of the protection of the men that employ labor in this country.

Another thing, gentlemen——

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; for a question.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does not the present law and the police officials as a general thing in this country protect the rights of the laboring man when he wants to work?

Mr. STERLING. Yes, of course it does; but gentlemen who vote for this bill are voting to take away his right to this protection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Oh, no.

Mr. STERLING. The man who wants to work has the right to do so under the law. I have read it to you, and it will not be disputed. He has the right to engage his labor on any such terms as he and the employer can agree upon. He has the right to go and come to and from his place of business. He has a right to be let alone if he so desires, the right to enjoy his hours of rest, a right to the peace and quiet of his own fireside under the law as it now is. But under this law he is deprived of the protection to these rights which the law now gives him.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. No; I can not yield to the gentleman any more.

Mr. BUCHANAN. For just a question?

Mr. STERLING. I can not. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 11 minutes.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. If I have the time.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I would like the gentleman to point out the particular part of this bill that permits any man to enter another man's home.

Mr. STERLING. Right here is is. I will read it to you now, and settle the question:

> And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works, or carries on business, or happens to be—

"Anywhere he happens to be," so says the bill. It makes no difference; he may be at his home, he may be at church, he may be at the counter, or at the anvil, or on his engine; he may be anywhere; yet under this bill others, one or many, may seek him out, whether he so wills or not, to persuade him to work or to abstain from working. That does not comport with my idea of liberty. It means liberty to no one. It means license to one man to interfere with the liberty of another. It is not equal protection under the law, and no part of American citizenship will resent it quicker than the laboring men of the country.

Gentlemen, you are deceiving nobody but yourselves on this proposition. I submit to you that the great rank and file of the laboring men of the United States are not demanding class legislation. Do not take the words of a man here and there who pretends to speak for labor. I say to you gentlemen on this side of the House and on that, whether you claim to be special representatives of labor or not, you are not any better representatives of labor than I am. [Applause.] Not a bit of it. I have in my heart the same sympathy for the laboring man that you have, and I say to you that the great rank and file of the American laboring people are not demanding class legislation.

Aye, Mr. Speaker, the very bulwark against class legislation in this country has been the workingmen. The men who toil, in the shop, everywhere, on the farms, on the railroads, in the mines, the workingmen everywhere have stood as the bulwark of safety in the United States against class legislation. Go to the man at the anvil, to the man on the engine, to the man in the mine, and at the plow; go to the man who toils, wherever you find him, and ask him if he is in favor of class legislation. He still believes in the principles of liberty and equality, and through him those principles will endure. He is wise enough to know and he does know that his safety, happiness, and prosperity rests on the Constitution, which secures to all men equal protection of the law.

This is class legislation. Argue, if you please, that Congress has the right to pass class legislation, but do you favor it even if it is constitutional? The Constitution provides that every State shall secure to all persons equal protection under the law. Shall Congress do less than is required of the States to preserve inviolate the principle that all men are equal before the law?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. STERLING. I submit, Mr. Speaker, this bill strikes at the very foundation, at the very fundamental principle on which our free institutions are based. It strikes at the very principle on which American institutions rest. Aye, if the Constitution does not say it, the Declaration of Independence says that all men are equal under the law. Should you now abrogate that principle by passing legislation that applies only to a part of our American citizens?

The last sentence of this bill abrogates the offense of conspiracy. Conspiracy is a combination or agreement of two or more, the intent of which is to do another an injury. The bill provides that such offense can not be committed in a labor dispute. Do gentlemen pretend to say that American laboring men are asking for legislation of that kind? His will be the first hand lifted against such a proposition. In conclusion, I repeat this bill has all the objections that were contained in the bill to which President Roosevelt referred when he wrote the letter to Secretary Knox. Mr. Bryan, although called on in that letter to state his position, publicly never did, to my knowledge, defend the proposition that was contained in the Pearre bill. Gentlemen, you should read this bill before you vote for it. I know that there are men on that side who would never have voted for the Pearre bill. You will find this bill contains the same ideas and seeks the same end as that bill. If you do, some of you gentlemen will join with us in adopting this substitute bill, which should be the law of the land. [Loud applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON. I yield whatever time there is remaining to me to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD]. I have 9½ minutes, I understand.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, how much time had I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has five minutes remaining.

Mr. STERLING. I desire to yield half a minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE].

Mr. CLAYTON. Very well, Mr. Speaker; I withhold my yielding to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CLAYTON. I wish to say, in all fairness to the gentleman from Illinois, I understood him to say that he had but one speech to make a while ago and insisted that I parcel out my time, which I did, he assuring me that he would have but one speech. After he has concluded that one speech, according to his previous statement, he now says he wants to yield five minutes to another gentleman.

Mr. STERLING. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE], I think, wanted to say a word and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CLAYTON. He has that under general leave. With the statement that it is only half a minute, I make no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] is recognized for half a minute.

[Mr. MCKENZIE addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield now to the gentleman from Arkansas the 9½ minutes I have remaining.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for 9½ minutes.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I wish in the limited time I have to confine my remarks to this bill. It has been assailed on various grounds. It has been assailed as unconstitutional and revolutionary. It has been assailed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] as being contrary to the interests of labor. Now, let us see. Take the first section of the bill. The legislation proposed therein was recommended by the President; it was drafted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON]. It was indorsed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], and he now proposes to offer as a substitute for this entire bill the Moon bill, H. R. 21486, which is substantially incorporated as the first section of this bill. Wherein is that unconstitutional? Wherein is that revolutionary? Wherein is that wrong?

The second section of the bill provides that hereafter when injunctions are issued that the plaintiff in the action shall be required to give security. The law now permits the court in its discretion to require security. Wherein is that revolutionary? Wherein is that unconstitutional? Wherein is that wrong?

The third section of the bill embodies two propositions. It reads as follows:

> SEC. 266b. That every order of injunction or restraining order shall set forth the reasons for the issuance of the same, shall be specific in terms, and shall describe in reasonable detail, and not by reference to the bill of complaint or other document, the act or acts sought to be restrained; and shall be binding only upon the parties to the suit, their agents, servants, employees, and attorneys, or those in active concert with them, and who shall by personal service or otherwise have received actual notice of the same.

To the first part I have heard no objection urged. Against the second part gentlemen seriously protest. In reference to the issuance of injunctions in the latter portion of the section these words occur:

> Shall be binding only upon the parties to the suit, their agents, servants, employees, and attorneys, or those in active concert with them, and who shall, by personal service or otherwise, have received actual notice of the same.

This provision forbids the blanket injunction.

That is objected to, and seriously objected to, by gentlemen on the other side. For what reason? Some say that it interferes with the judicial powers of the court. Others say that the courts do not enforce that provision anyway. What is the effect of the court issuing those blanket injunctions if they do not enforce their decrees against parties without actual notice? I will tell you the effect of it. It is the exercise by the courts, at the instance of the plaintiff or employers, of a kind of judicial intimidation over communities. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What valid objection to saying in the law that the court shall exercise no such power as that assumed and implied in the issuance of a blanket injunction? Now, as to the last proposition:

SEC. 266c. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property or property right must be described with particularity in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works, or carries on business, or happens to be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working; or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute; or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value; or from peaceably assembling at any place in a lawful manner and for lawful purposes; or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto.

It has been intimated that no one stood here and dared defend the last section of this bill. I defend it. I propose in the time at my command to devote the remainder of my remarks to the last section of the bill. And I will ask if you are opposed to the provisions of the bill as written, how many of you would favor the converse of the proposition? Suppose, instead of presenting the bill as it is written here, we change the language so as to read that hereafter in issuing injunctions the court shall have the power to prohibit any persons from terminating any relation of employment. How many of you will stand for that?—

or from ceasing to perform any work or labor—

How many of you would stand for that?—

or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means to do so—

How many of you would stand for that?—

or from attending at or near a house or place where a person resides or works, or carries on business, or happens to be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working—

How many of you would stand for that?—

or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute—

How many of you would stand for that?—

or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do—

How many of you would stand for that?—

or from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value—

How many of you would stand for that?—

or from peaceably assembling at any place in a lawful manner or for lawful purposes.

How many of you would stand for that?—

or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto.

How many of you would stand for the converse of the several propositions embodied in this section of the bill? Not one, and you know it. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] in his last appeal makes an argument that no one has previously presented, and that is, that this bill is against the interests of labor, and he thereupon appeals to the friends of labor to defeat it.

My God, is it not strange that at the prolonged hearings had before the Judiciary Committee the representatives of capital appeared before the committee, opposing the legislation, and yet no representative of labor was there contending that it was against his interest, against the interests of labor?

Oh, the gentleman says it repeals the law of conspiracy. He says it authorizes an invasion of the home. As to that section, what interpretation, what construction can be put upon any language therein that would justify his assertion that it allows anybody to enter the home of any other person? No; the gentleman is in hard straits for arguments when he presents such suggestions as he does in opposition to this bill.

But he says that it repeals the law of conspiracy. This bill has nothing to do with the law of conspiracy. Conspiracy under the law is a crime. This bill proposes to repeal no criminal statute. All the criminal statutes stand on the books as they were written, and will so stand when this bill is adopted.

What does it do? It provides that the courts shall not by the injunctive process interfere with persons doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such a dispute by anybody who is a party thereto. You talk of class legislation. This provision simply provides that the courts shall not interfere by injunctions in preventing any persons who are parties to a labor dispute from doing what they may be permitted lawfully to do in the absence of a labor dispute, and you insist by implication upon leaving the law in such a condition that you will have one rule for the laboring man and another rule for other people. [Applause.] It is to that injustice that labor objects. It is to remedy that situation that labor has insisted for years on legislation against the abuse of the arbitrary injunctive process and of unwarranted injunctions by the Federal courts. [Applause.]

No, Mr. Speaker, this bill does not violate any provision of the Constitution. This bill is devoted entirely to questions relating to judicial procedure in injunction cases. Its object and purpose is not to confer upon employees or laborers any special privileges or any privileges not accorded to other citizens under like circumstances. It is a measure intended to secure justice to labor in its disputes with capital.

The opponents of this class of legislation express great and almost reverential respect for the courts. As a lawyer I have the highest respect for the courts, but I can not share in the opinion so often expressed of late to the effect that any attempt on the part of citizens, labor organizations, or Congress itself to secure judicial reforms is a reflection upon the courts. With the exception of a few short provisions in the Constitution defining judicial power and providing for the Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, create and establish, our entire judicial system, together with all rules of procedure obtaining in our courts, are the work of Congress and the result of judicial interpretation. In the absence of congressional action, subject to the limitations of the Constitution, the courts have adopted certain rules and procedure of their own. In those court-made rules of procedure lies the greatest danger of judicial usurpation and abuse. It is as clearly within the power of Congress to correct an abuse growing out of rules and precedents of the courts as it is to repeal a statute of its own creation.

It is the contention of the advocates of this proposed legislation that such abuses have grown up under our system and now exist, and it is to correct such evils and in the interest of simple justice that this legislation is demanded. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON] asserted that "Equity is to protect great industry and great interests." I deny that such is the proper function and province of equity courts. Equity courts were established in order that right and justice might be done in cases where there was no adequate remedy at law. It was never intended to be used as an instrument of injustice or oppression to any person or to any class. The friends of labor demand the passage of this bill in order that hereafter unwarranted and improvident injunctions shall not, at the behest of capital, be issued against labor; simply this and nothing more.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are demanded. The Chair will count. Those in favor of taking a vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Fifty-two gentlemen have arisen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] One hundred and fifteen gentlemen have arisen in the negative—a sufficient number. The yeas and nays are ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the substitute will, when their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay."

Mr. FULLER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FULLER. Can we not have the substitute bill reported?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the substitute bill will be reported.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 48, nays 220, answered "present" 6, not voting 118, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 20840) to provide for deficiencies in the fund for police and firemen's pensions and relief in the District of Columbia.

Attest:

CHARLES G. BENNETT, Secretary.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

DAILY HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that until further order of the House the daily hour of meeting shall be 11 o'clock instead of 12.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that until further order of the House the hour of meeting shall be 11 a. m. instead of 12 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I take it it is the intention to push forward the appropriation bills; but I think there ought to be one day in the week when the House meets at 12 o'clock so that Members of the House can have opportunity to attend to departmental work, and therefore I suggest to the gentleman whether he would not be willing to except from the provision Wednesday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman the purpose of making this request is that it is the desire on this side of the House to drive the appropriation bills through practically to the exclusion of everything else until they are passed, and the purpose of asking the House to meet at 11 o'clock was to pass the appropriation bills. If the gentleman desires to do so I will modify my request.

Mr. MANN. I think it would not interfere with the gentleman's purpose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And I will ask unanimous consent that on each legislative day in the week, except Wednesday, the House shall meet at 11 o'clock, and on Wednesday it shall meet at 12.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama modifies his request, and asks unanimous consent that hereafter, until further ordered by the House, on every day in the week except Wednesday and Sunday the House shall meet at 11 o'clock. On Wednesdays and Sundays the meeting shall be at 12. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. FALL. I have here, Mr. President, an article printed in the El Paso Times of recent date referring to a matter which has been discussed in the Senate, and I would ask that the article be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

JAPANESE MAKE A DEAL WITH OROZCO—MADERO SPY IN EL PASO JAIL TELLS OF PLOT—SAYS RED FLAGGERS GRANTED MIKADO'S AGENTS MAGDALENA BAY AND OTHER CONCESSIONS FOR WAR MONEY.

In consideration of the Magdalena Bay concession in Baja California, and whatever additional concession they see fit to take, according to the terms of an agreement signed by three representatives of the Japanese Government and Pascual Orozco in Chihuahua on March 9 last, the Japanese are to furnish the necessary sums of money to Orozco to carry his revolution to a successful termination, was the declaration yesterday of Peter F. Aiken, who was a Japanese spy in the Russo-Japanese War and later a spy for the Mexican Government.

Aiken is at present in the county jail in El Paso serving a six months' term, having been convicted at the recent term of the United States district court on a charge of making a shipment of munitions of war into Mexico in violation of the President's proclamation.

Full details of the transaction which led up to the signing of the agreement between Orozco and the Japanese, together with the names of the Japanese, which he could not at this time recall, are among the papers which Aiken asserted he forwarded to E. S. Rogers, formerly a Congressman from Minnesota, 204–205 German-American Bank Building, at the intersection of Fourth and Roberts Streets, St. Paul, following his arrest in El Paso on March 20.

Included among the papers, Aiken said, is his diary, in which are the names of the Japanese representatives and maps of Mexico prepared by him during the nine months he was in Japan after the close of the Russo-Japanese War, which specify the proposed points at which the Japanese asserted they would land in the event of a war with the United States.

Magdalena Bay figures prominently, he says, in the maps which are in the possession of Mr. Rogers, for it was at that point he declared the officers of the Japanese Army told him they would land their troops and establish a base for supplies preparatory to the invasion of the United States.

Aiken asserts that at that time he was regarded with full confidence by the Japanese Army officers, having rendered them valuable assistance during the war with Russia.

With reference to the alliance that Aiken declared was entered into by Orozco and the three representatives of the Japanese Government, whom he said were generals in that army, he asserted that the Japanese are now furnishing Orozco money to carry on his campaign, the other sources, he says, having been exhausted some time ago.

According to Aiken, who said he went to Chihuahua for the purpose of seeing Orozco and getting some money from him, he was taken to Orozco's headquarters by Gen. Emilio Campa.

Shortly after they had entered the Orozco's apartment at Chihuahua, Gen. Inez Salazar came in, followed by three Japanese. The Japanese carried a large map of Mexico, which they placed on the long table in the office before Orozco. Orozco, Aiken said, was seated, while the Japanese remained standing.

During the conference the map passed from one side to the other, being marked at each passing by the Japanese with red ink. The marking indicated the places which were to be given to the Japanese Government as consideration for the money to be furnished Orozco by them.

Magdalena Bay, Aiken said, was the first place marked by the Japanese. They selected other points, Vera Cruz being among them.

After the ceremony of marking was concluded the Japanese, Aiken said, drew forth two bulky parcels, containing legal cap paper, embodying the terms of the agreement. One was the original and the other the copy, and had already been signed by the Japanese.

Both were handed over to Orozco and he signed both, returning the original to the Japanese representatives. All then shook hands, and the Japanese departed.

During the continuance of the conference, Aiken said, Orozco displayed anxiety, and showed an eagerness to have the Japanese take their concessions and fulfill their promises of sending him the money for his revolution.

When the papers were signed, Aiken said, Orozco turned to two other Mexican red flag generals and remarked that he had made an excellent agreement.

Shortly after this, Aiken said, he encountered the Japanese representative at the Palacio Hotel, and there asked them for $100, which they gave him.

He asserted that the name of one was Togo, not the admiral, but a general in the Japanese Army. However, he said that the names of all were in his diary, and this he expected to have within a few days, having written to Mr. Rogers to forward his papers to him.

Orozco, Aiken declared, had told him that he felt from the very beginning that the Japanese Government would come to his support, and he had always favored an alliance with Japan, and that he was willing to give them Magdalena Bay or any other concession they wanted in order to secure their assistance in carrying on his revolution.

The Japanese left Chihuahua the next morning following the signing of the agreement, going in an automobile from Chihuahua to Torreon, the railroad connections between Santa Rosalia and Torreon being destroyed at that time.

Aiken has been in the employ of President Francisco I. Madero, having accepted, he asserts, his recent position of spy with the Government forces from the President. He stated that Madero always entertained a great dislike for the Japanese, believing that if they gained a foothold in Mexico they would overrun the country and this would result in either war with Japan or with the United States.

Orozco, Aiken stated, during the Madero revolution against Diaz had made a suggestion to Madero to the effect that the Japanese be given concessions in Mexico, but to these overtures Madero was firm in his denial.

At the close of the Russo-Japanese War, and while he was in Tokyo, Aiken said that the feeling there against the United States was very bitter, and that the Japanese at the time were preparing for an invasion of this country.

To this end, he said, they prepared maps of Mexico with a view of securing concessions from the Mexican Government, and from these maps he made his copies.

Aiken declares that the Japanese figure they could never waste time in taking the Philippines, which they could do without any serious trouble, but would land their troops at Magdalena Bay and other coast points of Mexico, and would then invade the United States.

With the Japanese spies that Japan has at present in the United States, Aiken says, they could organize a formidable army.

Aiken enlisted in the Japanese Army as a spy in Washington, D. C., being accepted by the ambassador of Japan, he says, after his first application.

Aiken was engaged as a spy by Diaz during the Madero revolution, and later figured in this capacity for Madero until his arrest and conviction here in El Paso.

His father is master mechanic of the Hillsboro-Northeastern Railway at Hillsboro, Wis., and his sister is principal of the high school at Glidden, Wis., he says.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I desire to make a statement with reference to the article which has just been read.

I would not ordinarily ask that a newspaper article should be read and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but this clipping came to me from as responsible and reliable a man as there is in the southwestern country. He is a man who is representing very large interests in Mexico, not the corporation interests but the interests of seven or eight thousand American colonists in the Republic of Mexico. Accompanying this newspaper article was a letter from this gentleman. I know him and have known him for years. I can vouch absolutely for his responsibility. I have not dared to send the letter to the desk and to ask to have that printed, because to publish his name in connection with this article with the contents of his letter might possibly cause very grave complications and might inure to his injury, as he is engaged in Mexico, and the interests of those whom he represents are altogether in the Republic of Mexico. It is under these circumstances alone that I would ask that a newspaper article be printed.

AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURNHAM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 18960, the Agriculture appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, I desire to offer two amendments to the bill. First, on page 23, line 20, after the word "demonstrations," I move to strike out the words "and for" and to insert the word "in."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROOT in the chair). The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, line 20, in the committee amendment, after the word "demonstrations," it is proposed to strike out the words "and for," and in lieu thereof to insert the word "in," so that, if amended, it will read:

For farmers' cooperative demonstrations in the study and demonstration of the best methods, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BURNHAM. Now, on page 88, line 3, after the word "when," I move to insert the words "officials and," to correspond with the fourteenth line in reference to the same subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 88, in the committee amendment, line 3, after the word "when," it is proposed to insert "officials and," so that if amended it will read:

That hereafter when officials and employees of the Department of Agriculture, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, on yesterday at frequent intervals we were interrogated as to the remedy to be proposed for the evils complained of. I send to the desk a proposed amendment, to follow the provisions relating to the forest reserves.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Following the provisions relating to the Forest Service, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That whenever after the passage of this act any State within which the United States shall have public lands, reserved or unreserved, except lands held in connection with actual Government use, shall by constitutional provision provide for acceptance of the grant and conveyance of the lands as herein provided and for the enactment of such land laws by the legislature of such State as shall in the judgment of the Congress, to which such constitutional provision shall be submitted, insure a wise and adequate control, administration, settlement, and disposition of such lands by the State, then the President shall, by patent, convey such public lands of the United States to the State within which such lands lie, and thereafter the lands so conveyed shall be the property of such State and shall be held, administered, settled, and disposed of by such State in accordance with the laws of such State.

That after the transfer of such lands to the State they shall be open to settlement and sale under the laws of said State.

That the States within which such lands are situated shall pay into the Treasury of the United States 5 per cent of the moneys received from the sale or rental of such lands by the State.

That no State shall, by law or otherwise, grant or dispose of any such lands to one person or association of persons or corporation in greater area or quantity than the amount as is now provided by the laws of the United States according to the use thereof.

That the grant and transfer of such lands by the United States shall include all coal, mineral, timber, grazing, agricultural, and other lands and all water or power rights and claims and all rights in lands of any character whatsoever.

Mr. HEYBURN. The effect of the amendment is to transfer the administration of the public lands of the United States to the respective States in which they are situated. A primary reason is that of convenience of administration and efficiency as well. The distance of the applicant and the subject of the application are so far removed to-day from the administrative center that great hardships and impossible conditions arise. The basis of most complaints is that, because of the distance of the applicants from the source of judgment, it is impossible both from a financial standpoint and one of physical possibility for them to comply promptly with the requirements.

I have read with much interest and amusement at times the provisions with reference to the entering of homesteads and the conditions imposed upon the parties seeking to enter homesteads.

It was suggested yesterday in the discussion of this question that when lands were to be eliminated from the forest reserves notice should be given of that fact and transmitted through various channels to the head of the department in Washington; that thereupon a survey and inspection or investigation would be made; and having been made and a report thereof transmitted, the rights of the party would be considered. The inquiry arose in my mind where would the applicant be during all of this time—living in his canvas-covered wagon at the border of the State or somewhere along the public highway and paying for the right of his poor old horses to graze upon the wild grass that grew along the highway? Those are the conditions within the contemplation of the suggestion.

A man who wants a home can not wait for these conditions. It is a physical impossibility, as well as a financial impossibility oftentimes, for him to wait. He will go on to some other promised land and try to find a home elsewhere, and the State of his choice loses the opportunity for him to become a citizen and that which would flow from it.

Mr. President, that is in keeping with much of the administrative provisions against which we now protest. The man hunting a home is not, as a rule, if ever, possessed of any more than sufficient means to pay his expenses while going to the new home and during the period intervening before his selection and the productiveness of that home. The elimination of areas termed agricultural within forest reserves has been most frequently granted to those who are sufficiently wealthy probably to stop at a hotel in some neighboring town and wait until they could get a segregation authorized that would enable them to get some desirable piece of land, but it has no application and serves no useful purpose to the ordinary homeseeker at all.

I want that thought to rest in the minds of some Senators who intend to give their attention to this matter, because it is one of the greatest of all evils growing out of the system. I epitomize it in this way: They provide that a man hunting a home shall wait for inspection, classification, survey, and the routine performance of these duties before he knows whether he will get a home or not. My colleague [Mr. BORAH] yesterday read a letter from one of the officials that very well illustrates this proposition, but you can carry it away out beyond the party interested and mentioned in that letter into the general body of home seekers. That is the condition that we are confronted with. I am not going to spend time inveighing against it, because I only cite it as an illustration of the necessity for some change in the manner of acquiring homes.

That condition could not exist if the administration of the public lands was in the State government. It would not exist because it would be too close at hand, and some neighbor could conveniently call the attention of the State authorities to the matter or call it to the attention of the member of the legislature who went up from his immediate environment to the capital, or to any one of a dozen sources, and have it corrected, or he could telephone from one part of the State to another. There is no part of our State that is not connected by telephone, and he could call up an official and call his attention to the fact that he desired to settle upon this piece of land, and the State land board, or whatever it may be denominated, would adjust it, and they could do it in a few days instead of many months, as now.

So that this proposed transfer of jurisdiction would obviate those delays or that class of delays. It could be speedily determined. As now, you do not know who is in charge of the investigation. They will not allow you see the official report in the Land Office. You can get no line whatever on it until perhaps in two or three years you are officially notified in terse language that your application has been rejected.

I have files full of letters of actual cases of that kind, but inasmuch as I presume that many other Senators have the same class of communications, I will not encumber the RECORD by inserting them.

That is one of the reasons for transferring the jurisdiction over these lands to the States in which the lands are situated, because in the first place the applicant must be a citizen of the United States and he must be a resident of the State in which the lands are. That is his environment; that is the condition that must exist; and why should not the law be administered more conveniently in the State under the safeguards provided for by the proposed amendment?

Now, let me make plain what the proposed amendment is. It is, first, to transfer the jurisdiction to the State. It does that by transferring the title of the lands to the State, but the precautionary measure is that the State shall by constitutional amendment first, before it is entitled to these lands, provide to the satisfaction of Congress such basic law or principles of legislation as will insure against erratic legislation by the State or against the squandering or the waste of the land.

Now, in the Carey legislation we allowed the States to take title to the lands, subject to certain supervision remaining in the Government and subject to legislation by the States, but from my observation of the working of that law I think it is open to criticism that it is subject to changing legislation by the States.

Now, we simply transfer a satisfactory system of laws approved by Congress, guaranteed by the constitution of the State, which must meet with the approval of Congress, and then we turn over the lands to a well-equipped, well-guarded, and safe administration. We meet there the objection of erratic legislation; we meet there the objection that the States would squander the lands. Congress under this proposed amendment first establishes the organic law under which the States may act and protects against the possibility of the happening of these dire things.

Now, that is the second proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr President, if the Senator will permit me, what provision does his amendment make as to the expenses of administration after the States have control?

Mr. HEYBURN. The State administers its lands now, and it provides within the law regulating that administration for certain payments, sufficient to compensate it for expenses. No profit is to be reaped by anyone; and the other is a question of fees. It provides also for the payment to the General Government of 5 per cent of the money received from the disposition of these lands.

Now, 5 per cent may or may not be the exact sum that would represent justice and fairness, but it is a tentative basis from which to consider this proposition about our character of legislation. That is in recognition of the fact that the State will make these lands taxable and will derive a benefit that to-day flows to no one, because they are not taxable either by the United States or by the State or State authority, and the State can well afford, when it sells a part of these lands, to pay 5 per cent of it to the Government of the United States in recognition of the fact that they have derived the lands and title and administrative power from the Government of the United States.

I want to dwell a moment on the reason for requiring a constitutional guaranty against reckless legislation or unwise legislation. We have no right to presume that States will indulge in unwise legislation, but nevertheless it seems to me that a guaranty against it doing so is proper enough in a transaction of this magnitude. The forest part of the public-land system is a losing proposition to the Government and has been always. It is a bankrupt proposition to the extent of millions of dollars. We are gaining nothing by retaining the title or the possession or the administration of these lands, but, on the contrary, are paying the price of a great many things every year for this luxury.

I proposed this at a former Congress, as Senators who were here at that time will remember, and received considerable support for the then proposed amendment. But the objection was made continually that we can not turn these lands over to the reckless disposition of the States. Mr. President, we turned the lands of Florida over to it a half century ago, and has there been any charge that Florida has proven either incompetent or unfaithful in the administration of those lands? In the treaty by which we acquired Texas as a part of the Union we reserved to Texas the absolute uncontrollable right over the public lands or the lands within the State. Has there been any scandal or complaint that Texas has not wisely administered the public lands? If so, it has not come to my attention. There is every reason to believe that the State will more efficiently and wisely administer these lands, and I will briefly refer to that directly.

Now, those are the provisions preliminary to the transfer by the Government of the title to these lands, and I bespeak for them the careful consideration of Senators. Senators whose minds have not been directed to the consideration of this question I ask to take up with an open mind, having before them the necessity of some change in the system. To those who have considered this question I bespeak that further careful consideration of the choice between the two systems.

Now, the amendment provides that—

Then—

That is, when these things have happened, when we have submitted the charter of our power, the charter that limits us in legislating on the subject, and it shall have met with the approval of Congress, and Congress shall have authorized that upon those conditions and those guarantees the administration shall be transferred to the environment of the man and the land, then the President is authorized to patent the lands to the States. States are not to be sneered at as irresponsible bodies, and I make no exception. The integrity of one State and the ability of one State are as great as another. No States in this Union were comprised of foreign people with such sentiments. You will find in every State in the West that the leading minds and masters who made and who have managed the affairs of the State had their training, or the foundation for it, under the influences and the conditions of the best civilization, intelligence, and culture in the United States.

I said once before—and I have taken some pains to ascertain the facts—that I can find in our mines a larger percentage of college graduates from the great institutions of learning in the United States than in any township in any State lying between here and there. They are there for the purpose of taking on practical experience. Every summer a large number of students and many graduates of our State university come to the mines seeking positions, which are readily obtainable by them, for the purpose of adding to that which they have learned theoretically—the practical operation and application of it—and that is true of all the great States of the West.

Colorado has one of the best educational institutions in the United States that depends upon that source for its patronage and students, and I submit the inquiry as to whether or not we may not safely intrust the administration or execution of this law to that class of men, because they are leaders among men wherever they are. They learned the lesson of leadership in the environment of the East and the great country lying between the East and the West, and they exercise the result of what they have learned in that country, and you can trust them.

But this provides the limitations within which they can act. Now, what next comes is the transfer of the lands:

Then the President shall by patent convey such public lands of the United States to the State within which such lands lie, and thereafter the lands so conveyed shall be the property of such State—

Patents are then to issue from the State as they do now under the Carey Act—

And shall be held, administered, settled, and disposed of by such State in accordance with the laws of such State.

I might have said "the laws thereof," but I wanted to emphasize, under the circumstances, by repeating that term. But after the transfer of such lands to the State they shall be open to settlement. The main thing to be considered in regard to these lands is not that they should be owned or held by either the Government of the United States or the government of the State, but that they shall pass into individual ownership.

We use the term "sale" to cover the location of mining lands. That is the term used by the courts as to all that class of property. The lands are to be held for settlement and sale under the laws of said States.

Those lines I repeat will not be subject to change after Congress has accepted the constitutional provisions of the State limiting the manner and the scope of such laws:

That the States within which such lands are situated shall pay into the Treasury of the United States 5 per cent of the moneys received from the sale or rental of such lands by the State.

That is a question which does not need to be dwelt upon. As I say, it is in recognition of this grant, and I think it only fair that that should be one of the sources. It will of course terminate when the lands are all disposed of—

That no State shall by law or otherwise, grant or dispose of any such lands to one person, or association of persons, or corporation in greater area or quantity than the amount as is now provided by the laws of the United States according to the use thereof.

We have the homestead limit; we have the mining limit; we have limits of various kinds as to coal lands, and so forth. That is open to consideration. I have incorporated that language in the amendment as a tentative source of consideration during the pendency of this discussion.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator from Idaho whether he thinks that under existing law the grant of sufficient coal land is permitted to enable an entryman to develop a coal mine?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does not the Senator think such an entry ought to be enlarged?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think it is sufficient, for the reason that the experience of a great many years has demonstrated the fact that coal lands may be opened up under such limitations. I have heard a good bit of discussion and suggestion here in regard to the necessity of larger areas. That started in a message from a former President embodying that suggestion. It was discussed at length in this body. I heard no good reason why there should not be an increased area. I will discuss that, however, when the time comes.

The next provision is:

That the grant and transfer of such lands by the United States shall include all coal, mineral, timber, grazing, agricultural, and other lands and all water or power rights and claims, and all rights in lands of any character whatsoever.

In other words, I want a complete elimination of these vexed questions from the legislation of this body. We want to send it where it can be determined under the laws of the State, in the courts of the State, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States courts, under the peculiar situation or condition of the parties.

Mr. President, the burden of procuring title to homesteads and other classes of public lands has grown so that men refrain from attempting to procure it. The prospector has practically disappeared. The prospector was the cornerstone and foundation of the mineral wealth of the United States. He was never a geologist. No scientific discovery of the precious metals was ever made in the United States that added to its wealth. Can any Senator or any geologist suggest an instance? I made the challenge in speaking before those men who insist that the scientific knowledge of geology is necessary to enable you to know where and to look up and find mining claims, and they never denied that fact. I repeat, no valuable discovery of mineral in the United States was ever made by a scientific man acting upon real or imaginary scientific purposes.

The prospector is a man belonging to a class that stands out by itself, and they have quit. They will not work under restraint. I will undertake to say that you will hear more and better real patriotic American citizenship around the camp fire of those prospectors when they travel over the mountains, guided by their own knowledge that can not be learned in any college—you will hear better American citizenship talked, you will hear better and broader principles of loyalty and love of Government than you will hear anywhere, I might say.

Mr. President, when these lands are opened to be prospected and settled and purchased, those men will go into the field again, or others in their stead. Nearly all the old prospectors have gone out of commission since the creation of these forest reserves. You could no more get one of them to go on a forest reserve to prospect under the supervision or control or dictation or possible interference of a forestry officer than you could get him to come down here and put on evening clothes—not a bit. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] knows that.

What would old man Comstock have thought of scientific theories in regard to whether or not a vein could exist where he knew that it did exist? He did not care why it existed there. He had enough geological knowledge perhaps to know what the syenite footwall of a Comstock ledge meant, because he could stick his pick in it and he could strip it off and ascertain its dip and angle and do his work in the light of practical experience, and he did not have to look into any book to know it. He knew the minerals from long experience. He could estimate and judge of them and of their characteristics and quality and value about as accurately as the assayer could tell him.

Now, you have eliminated those people by this forest-reserve system. As I say, they will wear the shackles of no man. They will be subject to the carping criticism of no man. They will quit the business first. That is, the prospectors, men like Comstock and Kellogg and Jack Smith and John King. I could stand here and name those I have known until they would fill pages, men like old man Stevens, who discovered the existence of the mineral wealth of the Leadville Camp. I have heard geologists drawing $40 and $50 a day for testifying sit there and say that that ledge could not exist where Jack Smith said it did exist, and they would ask the jury to believe the scientific men. I have lived to see the prospector vindicated and the scientific man made the subject of joke who said that ore bodies could not exist; that the conditions were such that they could not exist at all.

I was in Leadville when the California and Nevada scientific men came there to examine those discoveries, and I heard them say there can not possibly be mines of any value here. They had never seen them of that kind in California or Nevada, and that was the limit of their wisdom. I heard them say that Friar Hill could not possibly have any value for mining purposes, and I saw it produce millions and millions of dollars almost at the grass roots. I saw the same in the Coeur d'Alene country from the Colorado men. I saw the same men who had disproved the wisdom of the Nevada and California experts confused in the Coeur d'Alene country because the conditions were different from those in Colorado or California. I know one of the richest mining men in the United States to-day who turned the Bunker Hill mine down for $35,000—and he had the money to pay for it—because it did not look like any mine he had ever seen and therefore it could not be worth anything.

Now, he was not a prospector. He was a mining man. There is all the difference in the world between a prospector and a mining man. A prospector is a hard-working citizen who goes out and takes his chances with climate and nature and poverty and hunger and spends his time in the discovery of mines. The mining man wears what we used to call a Thompson boot—that is, the fair-leather boots that laced up the side—and he parts his name in the middle, as a rule, and talks wisdom about geology, and he is trying to sell somebody else's property. That is the mining man as distinguished from the prospector.

Of course he goes out of business as mining ceases to be attractive to capital. The prospector goes out of business when any man dares to say to him your exercise of rights as an American citizen is subject to my inspection, approval, and control.

They have on this list of employees mining experts at so many thousand dollars a year. I am not going to stop to carp at the salary of some man, but those are the men—I was going to say in half a dozen cases that I could name, but I do not want to name too many people and things—who went to miners with whom I am acquainted and with whose property I have some acquaintance, and said to them, "You are wasting your time here. This will never make a mine. Get off here. You can not encumber the earth at this point. We are forestry inspectors, and this is the mining expert whom we have brought here to say whether or not you are justified in taking possession of this piece of property and expending your time on it."

In the days when mining was a great business in this country we had on the Supreme Bench of the United States some great men who had personal knowledge of mining and the methods relating to it. In the case of Chambers against Harrington the question came to them for decision if the court was to be the judge whether a man's discovery was good or if it was the man who staked his money, his labor, and his time. They decided in that case that whatever the miner was willing to spend his time and his money upon for purposes of development constituted a valid discovery of a mining claim. The courts have sometimes forgotten it. I had occasion 20 years or more ago to relitigate the question in the light of that decision against the opposing views of a court that undertook to insert the word "reasonable"—"with the reasonable expectation of finding ore." Chambers against Harrington said, "with the expectation of finding ore" and that left it, of course, to the judgment of the man who had the expectation to spend his labor upon it and his money. That supreme court held that they could read into the law the word "reasonable," "with the reasonable expectation of finding ore," but the Supreme Court of the United States settled that question. They held that the court could not write the word "reasonable" into the law.

Now, the Forestry Service is disregarding the law of the Supreme Court of the United States daily, and in a large number of cases, and is paralyzing the energetic arm and the intelligent brain of the prospector by holding that in their judgment he is not justified in spending his time or money upon it. They are disregarding the decision of the Supreme Court and they are silent when you call their attention to it.

That is the result of placing the power in the hands of the Forestry Service to say whether or not the prospector is justified in making a discovery and spending his time and money upon it. In arguing this case in those days I inquired whether or not it was reasonable to suppose that any man, poor as a prospector always is, anxious for speedy receipts, as a prospector always is, would waste his time in digging holes out in the mountains, oftentimes or generally many miles from comfort and civilization. There is no reason why he should. It is a little like the supposition that seems to be accepted that men go out and cut down trees for fun. There is nobody in this Chamber so energetic as either to cut down a tree for fun or to dig a hole in the ground or drill it in the rocks without reason—his reason, not somebody else's, not the substituted reason of a self-constituted critic, but the reason of the man who contributes the labor and assumes the responsibility.

I have felt justified this morning in dwelling some upon this, because it has resulted in closing up the source of mining and mineral wealth in this country to a very great extent. The only mines that are being worked to-day—there may be exceptions, but I speak generally—are those that were discovered before this black pall was thrown over the field of possibility. They are enlarging and extending the scope. They are controlling the market for mines and the product of mines by limiting the possibility of the development or discovery of mines. That is worth considering, when you realize that whatever we produce—and we certainly do produce a large quantity of it in this country—is the basis of our real wealth. We have a lot of promissory notes out, and they are good; but they are good because there is behind them the gold that results from the prospector's work. No gold mines have been discovered in Wall Street as yet that were open to location and purchase by the prospector.

So that is a great question, and I do not feel called upon to apologize at all for having taken the time of the Senate in presenting it. It is a live question, and it is involved in this amendment. It is involved in the bill under consideration. Its fate is written in the lines of those documents.

I wrote the other day to our western country inquiring in regard to prospecting as to whether those old men or others in that place were at work scouring the mountains to find mines, and I was told that they were not; that they had been compelled to retire from that occupation because they would not submit to the interference and supervision and criticism and dominion of the forest reserve representatives. Why should they submit? Right in the State of Idaho, in the county in which I live, we produce one-third of the lead produced in the United States. We produce vast quantities of silver and gold and copper. But we are producing it from the mines that we had succeeded in securing before the forest reservations were blanketed over that country.

The southern part of our county, which was only not developed along those lines because the area of the country was large and the people were few, is as rich in mineral resources as that from which we are now producing $22,000,000 a year. That is in one county, in one part of a county, in a small fraction of a county. But nobody will go in there in the forest reserve subject to its intereference, restrictions, and annoyances even to look for it. If you found it they would find a reason to make it undesirable, so much so, first, that you would not develop it; and second, that if you did nobody would buy it.

Men will not go within a forest reserve where they can not cut a stick of timber for ordinary accidental transient use without sending for a forest State ranger to some point difficult of ascertainment. They would not be bothered by it. They will say, "We will quit the mining business; the annoyances have accumulated to such an extent that we are not willing to subject ourselves to them"; and unless we can pass a compulsory mining law that will compel men to prospect and other men to buy and operate the mines, it looks to me as though we were limited to existing conditions.

Send those prospectors back into that country by adopting this amendment so that those lands will be free and open to exploration, as Congress said they should be when they passed the acts of 1866 and 1872.

I will not undertake to characterize or to dwell at length upon the reasons that have brought about this condition. I can cite just one brief instance that may be a cue to it. A neighbor of mine, or at least a fellow townsman, had a mining claim, and a very good one. He had discovered it and worked upon it from 1884 up to 1892, when this occurred, and through his individual labor, or by it, he had opened up that mine until it had a splendid showing of ore. He went to one of the representatives of a large mining combination that had bought up a whole section of country and was mining it to great profit, and he said to him, "I would like to sell you my mine; you know it is a good mine." "Yes; I know it is a good mine; I think it is one of the best new properties in the camp, but," he said, "I can not consider the question of buying it with you until I have consulted with certain members of the Mine Owners' Association, because they have an arrangement for the limiting of the purchase and development of mines; they do not want new producing mines contributing to the market of metals and ores"; and he added, "I will let you know at a certain time." And he did. He then said, "I have consulted with a certain man"—who was a very large operator and one of the officers of this organization—and he said, "We have concluded not to purchase any more mines just at present." A little mine like that in the hands of an individual of limited capital is useless unless he can get the facilities for milling, transporting, and working his ore. The smelting combination limit the quantity of ore that will be purchased, and they have a system of discriminating as to what ores will be taken and what will not be taken. So, in a measure, they limit his market.

I am talking in the presence of men who know about these questions, and I shall assume that, if they are silent, they concur in what I am saying. The combination will limit your opportunities to mine the ore, transport it, and sample it, and they will limit the opportunity to sell it. They will say, "We will take so many tons from this mine, so many tons from that mine, and so many tons from another mine," and they tell them to what point they are to ship it. They will wire you, "Ship your ore this month to Kansas City," or "Ship 50 cars to Leadville," and so much to another point. They will tell you not only on what terms you may market it, but will tell you where you must send it.

That is a condition that is brought about very largely by the limitation of opportunity to discover new mines and open them up. They do not want new mines opened up unless they can control their output; they do not want new mines opened up unless they can control the disposition of the product of the mines.

I am speaking now of a combination. We have in our country individuals who are strong enough to disregard them, but the man who has spent his years and all the money he had to find the mine, who has only the find and not the realization, is not in a position to do it. Give those men free opportunity to open up mines, so that every morning when you pick up the newspaper you will be confronted with statements of new discoveries of mines, and you will break down these combinations. They did not exist as they exist to-day until after these prohibitive conditions were brought about. So much for that.

For that reason, I want the public mineral lands of the United States to go under the administration of the State governments, in order that those who live in the neighborhood, who know the conditions, and who are free to exercise their rights of citizenship, may have something to say about the terms and conditions upon which the discovery and location may be made.

Now, as to coal lands. The relation of the assets of the soil to the people of the United States is one that has been at times very much misunderstood or misstated. No thoroughly sane man would seriously propose that the Government own and operate the coal mines of the country. I have never heard anyone stand out for that contention. Conditions such as exist to-day in near-by States, and have existed in all parts of the United States within the last 12 months, amounting to a reign of anarchy and a disregard of law—by whom I need not say—are sufficient in themselves to afford a reason why the Government should not even consider the ownership of coal lands.

The object of the formation of this Government was to afford men opportunity to engage in gainful enterprise—individuals; it was not to form a government that should indulge in gainful enterprise. No one ever urged that as a reason for the making of the United States of America. The primary purpose was to give opportunity to the units of government. If the United States is justified in retaining the ownership of the coal lands and working them under any system, I care not what, it is equally justified in retaining and operating the farm lands, the fruit lands, the fisheries, and all other of the assets of the country.

Mr. President, I am going to ask for a vote upon this amendment at the proper time, and every Senator who answers to his name when the roll is called will be required to vote upon these questions. I might be met by the statement that all Senators know all about it and do not need to hear. They may be in the position of the apostle, or whatever he may be termed, in Arabia, who had a great reputation for wisdom and erudition. A concourse assembled for the purpose of hearing him. He came there, rose, and said, "How many of you know what I am going to say and how many of you do not?" They all rose in response to the first proposition. He walked away. The next time he came he propounded the same question, and in order to catch him they said, "None of us know," and he walked away. When he again returned he propounded the same question, and they said, "Some of us do and some of us do not." "Well," he said, "those who do can tell those who do not," and he walked away. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I merely referred to that old legend in order to suggest that when a vote is called for I should like Senators to know upon what they are voting; and while I realize that this is the luncheon hour of the Senate, yet I feel it a duty to the cause for which I speak to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROOT in the chair). The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	du Pont	Overman	Swanson
Bourne	Fall	Page	Tillman

Mr. JONES. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is absent on important business. I understand he is out of the city, and so I make this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] is unavoidably detained from the Senate, but he has a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. HEYBURN. I regret to have felt it necessary or proper to disturb Senators, and I hope I did not disturb them unduly in their luncheon hour. But I sit here week after week, month after month, and listen to their wisdom and give the questions they present that consideration which in the performance of my duty I must. I am presenting a great question, not that my presentation will add to or detract from its greatness, but I am presenting a question with a view of getting responsible action at the hands of Congress. The measures that I am submitting to-day will be the law of the land in the near future, and I am of the opinion that if the Senate will to-day give it that careful consideration to which it is entitled, they will avoid the necessity of much expense and vast labor on the part of the Government and of the legislative bodies—the two Houses. I am proposing a measure that will save to the Government of the United States millions and millions of dollars every year.

Now, I had said that when the rights to the assets of the country were being determined it was not in the aggregate but individually. The country has it already. They already have all the coal in the ground. You and I have an undivided interest in all the coal lands and the wealth within them and in all the forests, and there is no principle of law that would authorize Congress to give any part of it to any class of people. It belongs to all.

But I am speaking to the question of individual participation in the active use and development of the resources of the country, and that is the important question, and it is a question that some Congress is going to solve speedily. The withdrawal of men from attempting to take up land or discover mines or extract coal and ore will mean stagnation. It will mean an exaggerated form of the conditions that are to-day deplored by men who are content with a lachrymose contemplation of evils that exist in every direction. The remedy is not difficult. There is a man for every plow in this country. There is a man for every pick and shovel in this country. There is a man for every opportunity that exists. The difficulty of to-day is that some one, like a little thoughtless child, has encompassed its toys and possessions within its arms to exclude all other children from participating in them to save something.

We are a Nation considering how we may use things, not how we may save them. The saving is an individual proposition. The growth and development of this country do not depend upon savings. They depend upon the useful and gainful acceptation of these opportunities. That is what I speak for. Now, make available the coal lands either within our borders at home or in Alaska or elsewhere to American citizens with the same rights, and the American citizens will hold in their hands the solution of the development of coal lands, the production of coal to meet the necessities of people, and the American citizens, considered singly or in the aggregate, constitute the tribunal that must settle these questions.

Mr. President, I remember on this floor eight years ago when we were told by men who were responsible to Congress and to the people that the coal supply of the United States would be exhausted in 19 years 11 months 2 weeks and 3½ days.

They had figured it down. The visible coal supply in the United States to-day is greater than it ever was within the knowledge or conjecture of man. Do people mine coal and sink it in the sea? Do they mine coal not to be used? Do they mine coal for anything but use? Is there an abnormal reserve of mined coal in the country to-day? What would the people have done had it not been mined? On the question of evil in mining there is a lot of published talk about the waste of natural resources by a lot of irresponsible people who do not know how to think, who are talking to attract attention and to create the impression that they are possessed of great erudition. Turn them out and let them depend on their resources, without special favors, and they would starve to death.

Let us look at these questions in a reasonable manner. I repeat that inquiry: Where is the waste of lumber, the waste of coal, or the waste of water? Has it been burned up or destroyed. The amount of timber that was burned occupies about the same relation to the available timber remaining as does the point of a pin to the earth. I went out purposely to see it. I saw the fire. A fire always makes a big noise like these reformers and agitators. You might imagine that the whole country was crying out for relief; and I went out to look at those fields and went over them.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Along the lines of the suggestion of my colleague, with reference to the amount of timber in the country, may I read a brief article?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I read from an article in the Pocatello Tribune, a paper published in the State of Idaho, and the statement seems to come from Prof. Shattuck, of the University of Idaho:

IDAHO'S TIMBER WEALTH—ONE HUNDRED BILLION FEET AVAILABLE IN THE VAST FORESTS OF THE GEM STATE—ENOUGH TO BUILD 7,500,000 COTTAGES—STANDING TIMBER CAN NOT BE EXHAUSTED AT PRESENT RATE OF CUTTING FOR 140 YEARS—HEAD OF FORESTRY GIVES STARTLING FIGURES OF ONE OF IDAHO'S GREATEST RESOURCES.

SPOKANE, WASH., April 9, 1912.

Raw material available in the forests of Idaho for the manufacture of wood products is estimated at 100,000,000,000 feet board measure by Prof. C. H. Shattuck, head of the forestry department of the University of Idaho. This would provide sufficient lumber to erect more than 7,500,000 five-room cottages and several million cords of fuel wood.

"At the present rate of cutting, reported to be about 700,000,000 feet a year," Prof. Shattuck said in making the foregoing statement in the course of an interview here, "Idaho has a resource in its timber that can not be exhausted in the next 140 years. This computation does not include the annual growth.

"The present annual growth of our timber is estimated to be more than six times the lumber cut, and if the present policies are carried out the time will never come when the yearly timber cut will exceed the annual growth of wood in the State."

Prof. Shattuck said the State as a whole is yet in its infancy in the manufacture of wood, the amount of capital invested, and the number of men employed in the forests and mills. Capital invested in lumber manufacturing plants amounts to $17,872,478, or 55 per cent of the total investments in manufacturing in Idaho.

The value of the lumber products in 1910 was $10,689,310, or 47.7 per cent of the total value of all manufactures of the State; while 8,220 men were employed in the factories, 5,212, or 63.4 per cent, were dependent on wood-manufacturing establishments for employment.

The wood-manufacturing industry exceeded all others in Idaho in added wealth, contributing $7,344,532, or 58.8 per cent of a total of $12,479,643 in 1910.

Eight hundred and eight thousand dollars was expended by the United States Government in 1910 in protecting our forests from destruction by fire, and four of the fire-protective associations, composed of timber holders and sawmill operators, spent more than $100,000 in patrolling their timber lands and the holdings of private individuals of Idaho.

We protect our forests so that we may have the largest possible wood harvest. We have learned that for every thousand feet of lumber manufactured $8 is paid to wage earners, who must be clothed and fed, thereby stimulating other industries.

Men engaged in other industries are often inclined to feel they have no interest in forestry. Yet the prosperity of those engaged in any industry is largely dependent on the magnitude and success of other lines. For instance, if the entire population were engaged in farming, there would be little market for farm products. The farmer wants factories, where large numbers of wage earners who are consumers of his products may obtain the means to purchase what he has to sell. So it also is with the stock raiser and the fruit grower. Each must have a demand for his products to prosper. The factory owner has an advantage in being near large quantities of the raw material from which he manufactures his products.

If we multiply the figures given for Idaho's wood manufactures for 1910 by 6, the relative yearly growth compared with the annual cut, the result will indicate the actual possibilities of the lumber industry in Idaho and as it will be developed in a few years. The figures would show the value of our lumber products to be $64,135,860. This should stimulate every resident of the State to use his influence in protecting the enormous undeveloped resources of our forests.

So there is some chance of having some timber left after a decade.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am indebted to my colleague for producing the figures and the statement, unquestionably the result of intelligent investigation and consideration by an official of the University of Idaho. I understand Prof. Shattuck is connected with that institution.

We were sought to be stampeded here on each recurring Congress in the consideration of this bill by the statement that the timber of the United States would be exhausted in a certain number of years. More than half of that period has expired, and the timber of the United States is an increasing proposition. There is more timber to-day than there was 50 years ago. There is more timber in the State of Idaho than there was at any previous period. The cutting out of the large trees does not mash and destroy the trees that are coming on. It only gives them more sunlight and more opportunity to grow and develop.

Of course, I can not apply this to trees in the State of California, where I have seen and laboriously ascertained that some of them were more than 3,000 years old. I spent one Sunday afternoon at Guerneville counting the rings of one that had been sawed off. It had 3,200 indications of yearly growth, and it had grown out of the stump, the circle of which still remained, and the tree from which stump still lay on the ground with nothing but a bark, and on that tree there were indications of 2,800 years' growth. I computed the joint age of those two trees as 6,000, and they were in such a perfect state of preservation that they were being manufactured into great sticks and shingles and other useful articles.

We have reforestation in Idaho since I became a citizen of that State that is to-day merchantable timber, used for the timbering of mines and the building of cabins and all those useful purposes.

But I was speaking of coal. They have withdrawn in the State of Idaho a large area of ground, as possibly containing coal. I only wish they would find it. We would not object to their finding it, but do object to their withdrawing the land because coal may be there. We object to their preventing the investigation by the only people who will investigate, and those are the people who would gain something by it. A lot of Government experts investigate things without any interest in them except their salaries. A man who will investigate the public lands of the United States for the purpose of determining its wealth is the man who expects to gain something as the result of his investigation.

Mr. President, the public lands within the State of Idaho alone affected by the provisions of the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, amounted on February 1, 1910, to approximately 2,237,380 acres of land. That was a subterfuge.

We had succeeded in invoking the wisdom of Congress to the enacting of a law to prevent them from creating more forest reserves. So they changed the names, and they call them other things. Two million two hundred and seventy-seven thousand three hundred and eighty acres.

Of this area, approximately 1,327,280 acres are withdrawn from all forms of disposal under what is termed the "first form."

That is quoted.

The object of using that term and quoting it is to prevent the ordinary layman from knowing what they mean. They give it a mysterious name and designation, and you have to hunt up a separate volume to find out what that word means; but it does mean 1,327,000 acres of land—or as sites for reservoirs, sources of materials for construction, or protection of watershed areas.

This is a new item.

Approximately 950,100 acres are withdrawn under the "second form"—

That is quoted also—

as probably susceptible of irrigation and subject to entry only under the homestead laws as modified by the provisions of the act of June 17, 1902.

That is where they first attacked us. Then Idaho is also affected by another withdrawal—

The temporary power-site withdrawals, under supervisory authority, in the State of Idaho include approximately 115,000 acres of land along Salmon, Snake, Payette, Kootenai, Clark Fork, St. Joe, and Coeur d'Alene Rivers.

Then it gives the townships. I want to call attention to the invasion of the rights of the State in that regard. I will say that while I may seem tedious and occupy a good bit of time, I am going to make a record in regard to the merits of this legislation and the proposed amendment that will stand forever.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Idaho suspend for a moment? The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 18642) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, on request of the Senator from North Carolina, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside. The Senator from Idaho will proceed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I was saying that, at the expense of being deemed tedious or tiresome, I intend to make a record in regard to this legislation that shall stand for the contemplation and intelligent observation of the people of the United States in and out of Congress so long as this question may be open. It is high time that it was exposed. The people have grown weary of promises of reformation in regard to it, and although I speak to none but the chairman, nevertheless the record will be made and it will reach the people.

Now, they have withdrawn this land for the purpose which they designate—temporary power sites. The muck rakers, speaking personally through their chosen journals and papers, have wrought the people up until they really believe that there is some great danger of the monopoly of the use or right to use the waters flowing in the streams or resting in the lakes of the country.

I know good people who are content to allow other people to speak for them and accept the speech as evidence of truth. I have had people say to me, "Would you allow the monopolies of the country to gather up all the water power and water-power sites?" I was asked this morning whether I am in favor of that, and if not, why I was speaking the way I did yesterday.

In the first place, there is no such thing as property in water in any State in the Union. No person or combination of persons can obtain title to water. It is one of the free elements of nature. No law ever undertook to make property rights in water. What they do give is the right to use water and to use it again and again. There is no such possibility as monopoly in water or water sites. Under the law of one State the constitution declares:

The use of all waters now appropriated, or that may hereafter be appropriated, for sale, rental, or distribution; also of all water originally appropriated for private use, but which after such appropriation has heretofore been or may hereafter be sold, rented, or distributed, is hereby declared to be a public use and subject to the regulation and control of the State in the manner prescribed by law.

Not subject to the control of United States. That is a constitution. That provision was ratified by a Congress of the United States and is a part of the contract of statehood. Congress can not change the provisions of the constitution of a State. Congress can not repeal an admission act. Yet we have allowed these self-constituted guardians of the public domain to assume proprietorship over the waters of a State, and we have helped them by legislating so that the President, forsooth, may withdraw these waters and the use of them from entry and appropriation under the laws of a State.

The act which I have here and which is certified to the Senate upon a resolution that I offered asking for it recites that these withdrawals were made by the President of the United States. I do not stand here to criticize him in person, but I do stand here for the purpose of calling the attention of responsible Senators who must act under their oaths to respect and preserve the reserved rights of the States.

When Congress passed the admission act of Idaho it in express terms ratified the constitution. Idaho had made her constitution before she came here asking for admission, so that Congress was fully advised as to the wisdom and propriety of the constitutional provisions, and in express terms in the admission act ratified it as presented. I have read you section 1 of article 15 of the constitution of Idaho.

No man can reconcile this withdrawal or attempted withdrawal of waters and water-power sites with the contract writen into the Constitution. It can not be reconciled. There is but one conclusion, and that is that in reckless disregard of their duties under the law these intrusted agents of the people have undertaken to override the Constitution, and I am here to speak for the deliverance of a State from the hand of the spoiler.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. WARREN. I will state that the provision the Senator has read from the constitution of Idaho I think prevails in almost if not in precisely the exact language in Wyoming and other States.

Mr. HEYBURN. I presume so.

Mr. WARREN. I may say that so far as I know we have by no legislative act changed the condition there.

Mr. HEYBURN. We could not change it. Of course it is applicable, and it is contained within the constitution of other States. But I was seeking to point distinctly this question by a reference to the section I have read. Will Senators sit here and disregard a question of that kind for any reason of convenience? They will not do it in violation of principle, I know, but are we to be the victims of convenience and comfort as a State?

Why, some day those will be the great States of the Union, greater than those that are now great. We have passed a number of States on the road in the few short years of our existence as to population, wealth, and productiveness. I make this appeal to the Senators who were elected to represent the Eastern States and whose committee meetings at this particular time prevent their presence in the Chamber. You can, however, rest safe in the assumption that when the power comes to us we will not exercise it in disregard of the rights of any State.

No State—and I say it without animadversion upon any—no State ever grew with the rapidity of the State I represent in this body. It had lain there undeveloped because there were not enough people to cover the ground that far out. They had not discovered its natural resources and the possibilities. But when they came they were a select body of men. The drones do not reach there to any great extent. Perhaps now and then one is blown upon the breeze and lights there, but the record of productiveness in our State indicates that we draw from the best blood of the East.

And yet you would say that we are not capable of administering the coal-land laws. We are entitled to be your market. Under the laws of the country, under the laws of nature, we are entitled to be your market for coal or any other product of our State. Take that into your minds and digest it. We have been your market for the fisheries of New England. We have afforded you a market for the coal of the Alleghenies for a century, or a part of it, as it may be. We have afforded you a market for the products of your looms and your factories. We have afforded you a market for that which you produced and we did not. Now, in the turn of fairness, we are entitled to the position which nature placed us in without carping or criticism.

Why should you come to be masters of the natural products within our responsible boundaries more than that we should invade your boundaries of State? The right is not in the geography; it is in the citizenship, and an American citizen in that far western country has equal rights with the citizen in any other part of it.

When you talk about controlling the coal fields of Wyoming or Colorado or Idaho or of the State of Washington, you must not lose sight of the fact that nature placed them in a position to be your market in which to buy. They are entitled to it. It is one of the assets of their sovereignty. It is also a market in which you may sell. Under the law of retaliation, if you deprive us of that right to be made a purchasing market, we should retaliate by refusing to be your selling market. But the Government was not based upon such principles and will not be so conducted.

So, I say, turn these lands over to the jurisdiction where God Almighty placed them. Turn the coal mines over to the jurisdiction within which they are found. Turn the mines of all metals over to the jurisdiction where they were placed. Suppose that we had not acquired that territory, as we did, under the Louisiana purchase, would you be to-day in a position to say whether its coal should be mined under lease or under contract or whether the title should pass in some individual? No country of tenants was ever a country worthy of much consideration.

We want master men in the American citizenship. We want men who own things for themselves and work for themselves as far as is compatible with the possibilities. The larger the proportion of men who work for themselves in any community in any State or any nation the higher the grade of civilization. They will step freer. They will hold their heads higher. I would rather buy coal of the man who owns the mine than of a man who had it under a lease from the Government of the United States, because I would be contributing to the prosperity of the American citizen individually rather than contributing to a fund to be played with.

So I have no apology to make for including coal within it, and I have wanted to express those views for the RECORD for a long time. I am not in favor of leasing coal lands. I am not in favor of building up a State or a community of hirelings. I want individual responsibility behind these enterprises.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator says that he is not in favor of leasing coal lands. I wish to ask him what he would do with the large areas of grazing lands.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, just a moment. Last evening when the Senator was speaking of those questions some thoughts came into my mind, and I sought to contribute them to the subject he was discussing. He said he would rather not be interrupted, and he gave a very good reason for it, and I acquiesced. It was that he was coming to it. I am coming to that question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am very glad to have the benefit of the Senator's judgment upon that question——

Mr. HEYBURN. We have reached it.

Mr. NEWLANDS (continuing). For I think that by an exchange of views among the western men with reference to the various classes of lands we may probably arrive at some conclusion as to the code of law——

Mr. HEYBURN. So do I think.

Mr. NEWLANDS (continuing). That shall be applied to their government.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the reason——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think the Senator and myself——

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment. That is the reason why I thought an exchange of views at that time might possibly be beneficial, but I am at any time perfectly willing to take up a consideration of these questions for an exchange of views.

Mr. President, so much for the coal question, and I have only touched upon it. It is a great question and we will have it up for independent consideration during this session, I presume.

The mineral I have already discussed. The timber needs no discussion, because it is obvious that they have built up a fictitious idea and school in regard to timber that crumbles like a house of cards when it is touched. In the first place, they always come at you with the figures representing feet. It sounds large to say 200,000,000 feet. You can pile up 6 feet of timber of that desk. But they like to use figures in that way.

The fact is that we have in the State of Idaho probably the largest bodies of white-pine timber remaining in the world that are known, and we have had them there. I have been there nearly 35 years. Those who preceded me seem to have been free from the desire to destroy them, and I know that I may claim credit during the period I have inhabited the State of having respected that timber. I have neither burned it, nor cut it, nor wasted it, nor sought to obtain title to it or any part of it. I think if the disposition to plunder the public domain was as marked as it is pictured here there would not have been a stick of timber left in the State; they would have destroyed that which they could not use. The fact is nobody wants to destroy timber. There is nobody in the United States as much interested in its preservation as the people of Idaho, and there is nobody in the United States as zealous for its protection as the people of Idaho.

The trees are allowed to stand and grow until some necessity of use requires that they shall be used. I would keep more of it in my State, had I my way, than we do. Unfortunately, we ship probably 600,000,000 feet a year out of the State. We will need it in the State. We have about 1,200 individual sawmills in the State, and we have a few very large mills. I believe we have the largest sawmill in the world. The aggregate product of the small mills is about equal to that of the large ones. We have built cities and towns and communities and farmhouses and barns and fences and structures of all kinds out of that timber. Do you suppose that we would have built a tithe of them if we had had to go to some imported uniformed inspector to get permission to cut the timber? I would live in the cave of the bears before I would do it, and so would self-respecting American citizens. He will say, "Can you not get along without that tree there?" He will say, "Why do you want this tree?" when in your mind you have planned your house for your use or structure. You have considered this question, and here is a man who has arrived a few minutes before for the purpose of checking up what you chose in the exercise of your rights. He says, "You can not have that tree; you have got to take that one; and you must not cut any timber in this section"; and that may be the convenient place from which to draw the timber. Do you think I would settle or build anything within such a jurisdiction? Nor would any other man who was entitled to be an American citizen.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to pass that timber question for this time and go to the question of grazing. The first man engaged in an industrial enterprise of which we have an accurate record was a man who lived by grazing. He had vast quantities of stock. There is no record that he plowed any ground. I presume he did, however, but it was thought of small importance. Father Abraham was engaged in grazing stock upon the public domain. The best condition that exists is when grazing is reduced to inclosed areas. The sheep industry in Ohio demonstrates that. They raise more sheep to a given number of square miles in Ohio than we do on the broad plains of the West. You can raise more cattle upon inclosed areas than you can upon an unrestricted range.

I see the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] acquiesces in that. Yet we hear men inveighing against settlement because it would restrict grazing areas. I am for settlement and the inclosure of land and the responsibility that follows it. Those conditions can be best brought about by a near-at-home administration. Grazing is included within agriculture, not within the strict technical definition but by general acceptance, and I have the authority of the Century Dictionary for it. As the word is now used it includes all of those attributes and accompaniments that go with farming or tilling of the soil. When a man tills the soil he must have pasture for the animals engaged in it. He must have pasture for all the animals that are necessary attributes to the country life—the horses, the swine, and the fowls. He has to have pasture land for them. Why should not one man engage in plowing all of his land for the cultivation of grain and his neighbor maintain a grazing farm for the purpose of producing hay to sell to the other man? This administration of the law (and I do not confine it to an individual but to a system) would classify the raiser of hay and those who graze upon the stubble after the hay was cut as not being engaged in agriculture. They would call it pasturage. Pasturage is not necessarily confined to wild land.

We have whole farms, many of them devoted entirely to pasturage, some of them on the cultivated grasses in part and in part on the native grasses. We have bunch grass all over the West that is more nutritious and has a greater sustaining power than has any cultivated grass. That is pasture land. Is the Government to seize the pasture land and hold it as such when all pasture land is susceptible of being converted into tillable land? Are the Government officers to designate and set aside areas for pasture purposes and thus withdraw them from settlement?

I know plenty of men who have settled on land that would have raised any of the grains and crops, who settled there for the entire and exclusive purpose of pasturing stock of various kinds. I have in mind a man who took up a piece of land for the purpose of entering upon the raising of chickens on a large scale. That would not come within the provisions of the definition of agricultural land as it is applied and sought to be enforced by these agents of the Government. In such cases, if they were to apply for a patent for that land as a homestead they would be required to show that they had cultivated a certain number of acres, when perhaps the best use that could be made of that land would involve no cultivation whatever. That is true of pasture land.

Why not let the land go into private ownership under the restricted areas, as they now are, and let the man use them for one purpose this year, for another the next, and for another the next, according to the conditions that confront him? You can not do it under existing law. You have heard letters read here citing cases where men's homesteads were rejected because they had not cultivated a sufficient proportion of the land, when to have cultivated it would have defeated the purpose of the owner and would have been an unwise and foolish thing to do, because it was more profitable for the uses and the manner of use to which he put it. Let us get rid of that system. You will never get rid of these evils in the administration or the method of administration until you get rid of the law that creates them. You can not reform them; we have tried it for years. I would send such land to the State.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am very much interested in what the Senator is saying regarding grazing lands. I judge that he takes the view that the law should provide for a homestead entry, and that the use to which that land should be put should be determined by the grantee and not by the grantor.

Mr. HEYBURN. Entirely; that is my position.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I quite agree with the Senator that we should have in view the creation of homes in the main with reference to our public domain, and that if a man can establish a home and support a family upon grazing land he should have a homestead for that purpose. If he can support a family by agriculture, he should have a homestead for that purpose. The Senator, however, realizes that in our country a homestead of 160 or 320 or even 640 acres, such as they have under the Kinkaid law, would not enable a man to support a family, because the land is so dry that the yield is very scanty.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would like to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would first like to ask the Senator from Idaho to what extent he is willing to go in the creation of a grazing homestead as to area and as to whether he thinks it best that that grazing homestead should be established under an absolute title or temporarily under some kind of a leasing system, so that hereafter, with the improvements in irrigation, and so forth——

Mr. HEYBURN. May I answer there? I will have forgotten the Senator's first question before I reach the other, in all probability. If the Senator will ask his questions so that I may answer them as I go along, I will say, in the first place, I would have the settler the sole judge. One man will succeed on a piece of land where another would fail. A man may raise bees and make a living on a piece of land without breaking an acre of it, where a man who did not know how to raise bees would fail.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the senior Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. BORAH. Will my colleague yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. In order that they may go into the RECORD, I want to state some facts concerning some recent withdrawals, which, it seems to me, may be worthy of consideration; facts which have been brought to my attention lately.

The National Forest Service, at the instigation of the Biological Survey, have withdrawn from sheep grazing in the State of Montana, in the Gallatin and Absaroka National Forest, an area of about 450 square miles. This withdrawn land is estimated to be capable of carrying from forty to fifty thousand sheep, and now it is to be devoted entirely to the grazing of elk which overflow from the Yellowstone National Park.

It is estimated that in and around the park there are approximately 50,000 head of elk; more, in fact, than can be maintained in that country. These elk are increasing at the rate of 10,000 head per year, and if it is the policy of the Forest Service to continue to protect them by these withdrawals, it will only be a few years until the grazing land of these Northwestern States will be gone, so far as sheep raising, cattle raising, and horse raising are concerned.

Within the last two months 15 of these elk from Jackson Hole country, in Wyoming, were loaded on a car and shipped to the Wallowa National Forest, in northeastern Oregon, and there placed in a pasture containing 2,550 acres which had previously been devoted to sheep grazing. The sheep in this instance were moved to another portion of the forest, but were it not for the withdrawal for elk conservation at least 2,000 additional sheep could there be grazed.

This constant withdrawal of land in the interest of conservation is each year limiting the available land upon which can be produced the meat supply so necessary for the people, especially in the present condition of the supply as measured by price; and it is one of the causes undoubtedly which is operating in that direction. The sheep that have been denied grazing in Montana would produce $350,000 worth of wool and mutton each year.

I put this into the RECORD, Mr. President, because I think it is one of the abuses which is being practiced by this power to withdraw these lands. While they can not any longer withdraw land in the State of Idaho, the country, generally, I presume, is interested in having these grazing lands open to the sheep which are to be raised upon the western plains and prairies, if at all, to any great extent; and it all has its bearing upon the proper development of that country. I presume that it is well to have some arrangement with regard to these elk; but it does seem to me that, if there is to be a survival of the fittest, we ought to give the chance to the animals which are so useful in so many different ways.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am indebted to my colleague for calling attention to the question. It is one that enters into the consideration of the measure before us. The withdrawal of every 5 acres of land means diminishing the possible meat product from that country. Of course I am giving a very liberal margin there; but the average will sustain that statement. If you withdraw 20,000,000 acres of land in Idaho that would in itself produce meat enough to control the meat market in Chicago.

Those lands carry native grasses to an extent scarcely found elsewhere. When I first went into the Coeur d'Alene country, in the winter of 1883–4, I had occasion to move around, look at the country, and ascertain what I thought of it. I found on the ridges and the sides of those backbones leading up to the peaks a native growth of white clover and timothy—timothy hay—growing there up to my shoulders, native, indigenous, and white clover that would make it difficult for an animal in packing along those ridges to pass without stumbling. Those conditions exist over thousands and hundreds of thousands of acres that are to-day withdrawn from use. Of course that has an effect upon the meat supply. The population of the United States grows; its productive area diminishes. I set one against the other. It should be, of course, just the other way. As population grows the productive area should grow; but we seem to have fallen into the hands of those who have no realization of that.

Mr. President, I do not want Senators, or those who may hereafter read what I say to-day, to fail in information and its application in regard to those questions. There is withdrawn in the United States over 200,000,000 acres of land. That is larger than some of the largest States. It contributes nothing to the grain supply; it could and would, but it does not. So that if supply and demand affect the price of grain, then, of course, the application is obvious. Two hundred million acres of land! Suppose only 20,000,000 acres of it would produce wheat—and that is the lowest possible estimate—20,000,000 acres of wheat would go far toward supplying the wants of our people; it would graze hundreds of thousands of food animals. That it does not do so enhances the value and the cost of those that are raised. The withdrawn lands will produce more in grain or animals or food products to-day than is produced or is needed. There is enough sugar-beet land withdrawn within these forest reserves to add a large per cent to the sugar-beet production of the United States.

Who is benefited? Let us see. I intended yesterday to give the figures as to who is benefited and to what extent. Here is the question of solvency. It cost to administer upon this misused and misappropriated estate last year $5,919,939.96. That is, for the three items of "investigations, administration, protection, and so forth, of national forests" and permanent improvements of national forests. That is what it costs.

Mr. GALLINGER. That covers all of the forests, I presume.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; that is for all the national forests. We received $2,026,906.15. There is a deficit there.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator will recollect that in that aggregate of expenditure last year there is included a little over a million dollars for emergency expenditures on account of the fires of the previous year.

Mr. HEYBURN. I observe that is noted in the statement here. There was a deficiency between the cost—the amount appropriated, rather, for I do not know whether it cost that or not, and it is not fair to use the term "cost" to the expenditure of that money—but the difference between what we expended and what we received was the difference between $2,000,000 and $6,000,000. We are not going to grow rich at that rate. Why do we hang on to so unprofitable a business? Is it in the hope that it may become more profitable?

When we commenced upon this wild scheme—I will go back to 1907—the appropriation was $1,827,189.51 and the income $1,571,059.44. There was a deficit of $250,000 there.

Mr. President, I have interjected this statement because I omitted yesterday to state those figures definitely. I will put the entire statement into the RECORD, with the permission of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am approaching the end of my remarks. It may be encouraging to some to know that; but I have not any conscience that rebukes me for having occupied the attention of the Senate so long.

I now come to the question of water powers and claims. I have read the constitutional provision of Idaho and called attention to the fact that, in disregard of it, they have undertaken to set aside and seize upon the assets of the State of Idaho. I called upon the department long ago for a statement as to the amount they have received for the use of that which they have pilfered from the State, but they have thus far failed to respond. I want to know how profitable this nefarious business in taking somebody's else property is. I want to know whether it is sufficiently profitable for the Department of the Interior to pilfer the resources of Idaho so as to make it overpowering in its influence upon Congress. When they take that which the primary or fundamental law of the land says belongs to Idaho and advertise it and assume to administer upon it, I know of no better word to use than "pilfer," which means to take from.

We have a lot of learned treatises and articles written by clerks in the various departments justifying their action and telling why they do it. but they are not satisfactory. What lands within any State, constituting the resources of the State, need any interference on the part of the Government regulating their use? There is an item in the paper this morning showing the quantity of State lands, lands granted to the State of Idaho by the direct action of Congress—not a contingent grant, but a perfected grant—which they have included within reservations and with regard to which they deny that the State has paramount right and title. The lands were granted to the State when it was created; they are named in the State constitution and in the admission act; and yet, notwithstanding that, a braggart band seize upon them, throw around them an imaginary line, and say, "These lands are reserved and withdrawn and subject to the sole administration of a bureau of the Government." Five hundred and twenty-eight thousand five hundred and seventy-nine acres were thus taken from the State of Idaho; that is, they thought they took them. They intended to, and we will give them credit for the intent. Within those lands a citizen of Idaho may not enter except with the permission of these artificial guardians. They strike terror into the hearts of very good people. Their presence is imposing. In the first place, in many instances, they speak a language that the native can not understand. Not long ago I stood upon the platform of a railroad and saw one of them come up. I was interested. He was a beautiful specimen. He had a jacket nicely braided, and it was a peculiar green that made you think of Robin Hood. He had a cap on, you know, with a little cockade feather in it, and he was walking along stiff-legged when some man addressed him. He looked around, like a German officer is said to look at a man, as much as to say, "Address me with some respect, sir." The man proceeded to say, "I should like to know"—when he was interrupted with the statement, "Do not bother me now; I am busy; I am going on this train"; and he went. That is the kind of men the people there have to come in contact with. I do not know what the mixture of dialects was, but it was not United States. To that condition we have allowed the people of a sovereign State to be subjected. I am sometimes tempted to be lawless.

If I were in the position of those people who have rights and dare to want to exercise them, I would make short work of that case. There ought to be an open and a closed season for them, just as there is for other game. [Laughter.]

Why, Mr. President, last year and the year before they devoted their energies—and I believe they are qualified for that purpose—to catching wild game. They take advantage of the bounty laws of the State, which provide for the payment of a bounty for the ears or some other part of certain wild animals, and they find time in the performance of their duty to collect a great many hundreds of dollars from the State treasury. Of course that is not accounted for; that is one of the emoluments of the office. I am speaking advisedly. I have the reports showing how much those people collected for the killing of wild animals in the State of Idaho.

Mr. President, I do not feel justified in dwelling very much in the way of personal attack upon those people as individuals. The system is wrong. I only speak of individuals to illustrate and bring before your mind the system in its working form, in its operation.

We want that State land placed within the jurisdiction of the State. It is now nominally within the jurisdiction of the State; it is an absolute grant; but they have taken possession of it; their uniform terrifies the civil officers of the State; and they are allowed to occupy it and to control those who would enter upon it. Even the governor of our State or the members of the legislature will not be permitted to enter upon that land.

Mr. President, when we acquired that land from Louisiana we did it under a contract by treaty which provided that the land should be always open and subject to settlement and that proper and sufficient laws should be enacted for it. We have violated that treaty. I say now that there are conditions existing in that area which are worse than any we could imagine to exist had it remained a part of Mexico. The domination and offensive interference of this department or bureau of the Government could only be compared with the offensive interference and domination of a citizen by those in power in Mexico. It is something for the Nation to be ashamed of.

Will you keep it that way or turn it over to the States, in order that it may have the benefit of neighborhood consideration—home government? It pertains to the citizen of the State in his relation to the State as such citizen and not to his relation to any other jurisdiction.

I want homes. I would let the man select a home where he pleases. He can make but one selection. Senators lose sight of that fact. He can make only one selection, and he is pretty apt to see to it that he selects it according to his judgment. One man likes to occupy the forest; another the plains; another wants the benefits of living, running streams; another is content without them. I have known men to select their homes upon the arid plains from choice. I have known them from choice to select them far up in the fastness of the mountains. They did it in the exercise of a right guaranteed to them. We have been taking it away; we have been allowing some one to come along—some one unacquainted with the person or the circumstances or the capacity of the party interested—and lead him out and say: "You take that piece of land or none. I will withdraw your right of citizenship, unless you exercise it in accordance with my wishes or my judgment."

That is what we have to confront. The attempt—I will not say the attempt, the inclination of too many people to take charge of some other man and run him and control him in the exercise of his rights seems to be growing. The man who does it willfully is a coward. The man who enslaves another would himself be a slave if put in the hands of a stronger man.

The disposition to interfere with some other man's right of citzenship seems to be growing. There will be no individualism in this Government if we keep on. In public affairs the majority should rule and govern, but in personal affairs there is no minority or majority except in the balance of the mind of the individual; and you want to keep that distinction clear. The law should have nothing to do with the individual exercise of the individual rights. The law applies only when a man undertakes to violate it. Ninety people out of a hundred are not restrained by the law. They would do the same if there were no law on the subject. They would be just and fair and equitable in their dealings with each other in the absence of the law. It is only the smallest percentage of people who need the law for strength.

I am almost tempted to point that with existing conditions to-day, but I am afraid I would spread it out into a field that might be broader than the occasion would seem to warrant.

Mr. President, I do not know that the disposition of this body will prompt it seriously to consider a transfer of the jurisdiction of the public lands to the States, but I have sown seed which will light somewhere where it will find root and grow into the only condition that will solve this question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. BURNHAM. The amendment offered by the senior Senator from Idaho involves the proposition of general legislation upon appropriation bills. It has not been estimated for and has not received the consideration of any committee, and therefore I make the point of order against it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the discussion of this particular matter contained in the pending appropriation bill has ranged over a very wide field. I must say that I have been surprised at the position taken by some of the Senators upon the propositions which have been discussed. I can not understand, Mr. President, why, in the opinion of any Senator, a man who seeks to acquire a homestead, a home upon the public domain, should necessarily be convicted of theft or be considered a thief because some portion or all of such homesteads might be what is classed as timberland.

I admit I can not understand the proposition from that standpoint. You can undoubtedly obtain photographs of timberlands, of lands growing magnificent timber, upon which homesteaders have sought to acquire homesteads. But it seems to be the impression among some Senators that lands which grow timber are not fit for homesteads. It seems to be the impression among some of the Senators here that if a man undertakes to acquire a hundred and sixty acres of land upon the public domain under the laws of the United States, and some inspector of the Land Office can take a photograph of his proposed homestead entry and show that upon the homestead entry there is growing timber, that necessarily that man must be in the employ of some great corporation and that his object is not to make a home for himself and his family, but that necessarily it must be to acquire the timber for the purpose of disposing of it to some malefactor of great wealth.

If that were true, I should like to know what would have been the condition of some of the greatest States in this Union to-day. The pioneer's first business in Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, the great Middle West and the South has been to clear the timber from his land that he might grow crops upon it, and yet we are confronted here with the proposition to-day that if a man in the western country undertakes to acquire a homestead upon which there is growing timber, necessarily he must be branded as a thief.

Mr. President, we hear of thieves. We hear of the one man who, contrary to the law and the regulations, possibly, of the Interior Department, seeks to acquire 160 acres of timberland for the purpose, as is claimed, of turning it over to some great corporation. We have heard that, for instance, but I have heard no one here, except the Senators from Idaho, speak of the hundreds of thousands of citizens of this great Union of ours who are going down into the desert and trying to go into the mountain regions of the western country for the purpose of developing the country and making homesteads. Millions of homesteaders have taken up lands, and they have fought not only against all the local and natural difficulties, but fought also against the bureaucratic difficulties which Congress has placed in their way, because it is Congress which is to blame and not the executive department. These men who contend with all these things are never heard of except when it is claimed that one of them tries to acquire land for the purpose of selling its timber to some malefactor of great wealth. It is carried to such an extreme that I have known instances in my own State very recently where a man had a homestead, or at least a homestead entry, segregated from the public domain long prior to the Executive order constituting a forest reserve in that neighborhood, because on his 160 acres there happened to be 20 acres of as fine timber as can be shown in the photographs presented from the State of Oregon. Although he had segregated that land from the public domain by making a homestead entry upon it, the forest reserve having been thrown around his land, the officers of the service took forcible possession of it during his absence and said that he should not go into his own home or enter his own front gate.

I know it is hard for Senators to realize that things of this kind can happen in a free country. I know that it is almost impossible for the Senator from Mississippi to realize that such a report was made as was read here from a special agent of the Land Department with reference to an agricultural entry on a forest reserve. I know it is beyond reason, and that you Senators who do not come into actual contact with these conditions can not realize what we who are undertaking to develop the West have to contend with; not only, as I say, in overcoming the natural obstacles to settlement upon the public domain, but in undertaking to avoid the horde of special agents who hound us when we are undertaking to segregate 160 acres of land from the public domain.

I tell you, Senators, you have upon your statute books to-day a law allowing the head of a family to take 320 acres of desert land and to acquire title to it. I want to say to you that under the regulations thrown around that desert-land entry any man who undertakes to make a desert-land entry to-day in any State in this Union jeopardizes his liberty, and he is liable to be indicted, as hundreds and thousands of our people have been indicted, for attempting to steal the land from the United States Government, simply because they are compelled to comply with such restrictive regulations that it is impossible for them to do so. When they undertake to make final proof, a horde of special agents confront them in the land office—the land office established by the Government of the United States for the purpose of enabling the people to make homes, to segregate these public lands from the general public domain—and before these land offices appear special agents of the Interior Department, special attorneys general of the Department of Justice, and a horde of detectives to prove that this man has cultivated one-sixteenth or one-hundredth of a quarter of an acre of land less than he is supposed to have cultivated under the laws which you have passed presumably for his benefit.

I have advised client after client that he should not attempt to make a desert-land entry in the State of New Mexico because he laid himself liable to go to the penitentiary if he undertook it. He could not comply with the rules and regulations.

What would have been the condition of the great States of this Union—of Mississippi, for instance—if you had sought to throw around the public lands in Mississippi the same restriction that you have thrown around the timber lands in the Western States of the country?

I want to ask the Senator from Oregon if the forest-reserve law is good for his State, why the State does not acquire all the forest lands within its boundaries and retain them for future generations?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I might answer that by saying that the lands that are not now in the forest reserves and which are in the Government of the United States have heretofore been covered up by railroad companies or timber syndicates.

Mr. FALL. And the Senator has in his possession now, as an exhibit to the remarks which I presume he will make, photographs of a little shack, photographs of log houses such as all our pioneers occupied, placed upon the forest reserves, and because there is standing timber shown in the photographs he would have us believe that those men are thieves who built the same character of log houses which our forefathers occupied in the development of all this great country.

I should like to know where my native State of Kentucky would have been. At least Abraham Lincoln would not have been born in the State of Kentucky if the present theory of certain Senators and of the Government had been carried out, because the great State of Kentucky would have been a forest reserve in itself, or at least that magnificent portion of it known as the blue-grass region of which all native Kentuckians are so proud. There would have been seven Senators who would have hailed from some other State than Kentucky occupying seats in this body to-day if the theories of the gentlemen who are advocating forest reserves and reservations of the public lands had been carried out.

What would have been the condition, as I asked awhile ago, of the native State of the Senator from Oregon, who, I believe, is a native of Mississippi? There they are asking to-day millions of dollars at the hands of this Government for the protection of their fields from the Mississippi floods, and they should have it. What are those fields? Hardwood timber covered every acre of it—timber more valuable than any tree or any acre or any hundreds or thousands of acres which ever grew in the State of Oregon or any other State west of the Rocky Mountains.

Our forefathers, our people for generations, have been cutting the forests and tilling the soil under the trees or where the trees grew. Millions and millions of dollars have they expended in extracting the stumps of the trees to make tillable fields and to make the ground productive, and to-day you are told that a man who undertakes to acquire a homestead under the public-land laws of the United States, if he seeks to acquire that homestead on land on which there is an acre of timber, he is presumably a thief and, if he does acquire it, should go to the penitentiary. That is the theory of these conservationists.

Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, if the Senator from Oregon or any other Senator here chooses to retain the forest reserves which have been established in his own State, let him do so. I think that it is contrary to our entire system of government; that this idea is entirely foreign to our system of government. Canada retains the old idea that the Crown minerals, the precious minerals, belong to the Crown and the Crown does not part with them when she gives to one of her citizens 160 acres or more of land. That idea is just as foreign to our institutions as is the proposition advanced by some of our representatives and which at least some of the gentlemen representing the so-called executive department of this Government are seeking to engraft upon our public-land law system.

The very difference, the distinction between our system and that of monarchial government, was that under monarchial forms of government the Crown minerals belonged to the Crown, and when they parted with the fee to the land they retained to themselves all the mineral known as precious minerals or Crown minerals—silver and gold, and in some places copper—iron, coal, and oil being excepted, the reservation being made, whether it was written in the contract or not, that the Crown owned the Crown minerals.

The United States Government, when it established public-land laws, provided that every citizen of the United States was a monarch; that the Crown minerals belonged to him as the uncrowned king of his 160 acres. But now we would have that entire system changed, and we would have the Crown minerals belong to the Department of the Interior or some one else and reserved.

I say to the Senator from Nevada that as one of the western Senators I am ready to get together for anything for the West, but we are so far apart that never could we shake hands upon a proposition to restrict the owner of his 160 acres, who has fought the natural enemies which he must overcome and has finally overcome even those enemies whom we have built up, whom we have pampered and fed. I will fight any proposition that does not give him the absolute, indefeasible fee to the land and all that is above it and all that is under it, including the waters which may lie upon it and which he may use for its irrigation.

Sir, any other system is not only absolutely wrong, not only unrepublican, but it is absolutely cruel, and to adopt some of the suggestions which have been offered here in the Senate will make of this great West a nation of tenant farmers.

Our whole Government has been built upon the theory, our whole public-land system until within the last few years has been built upon the theory, that every American citizen was a monarch; that he should have his 160 acres as a home for himself and his as long as he or they might live, and there should be no restriction upon the ownership of the land or upon the ownership of anything contained in the land or in the trees growing there or in the water existing thereon.

But another theory is advanced here in seriousness by Senators which to me is appalling. I can not conceive how any Senator understanding the working of our land laws, understanding the difficulties which our pioneers have to overcome now to acquire a home upon the public domain—I can not understand how any Senator or any official of this great Government would throw one obstacle in his way. I can not understand why a unanimous vote should not be cast here to give every man, woman, and child in the United States who will remove to one of those States 160 acres of land without requiring him to live upon it a day or a week or a month.

It seems to be the idea of some Senators that if you acquire 160 acres of the public domain you take it away. Where does it go? That land remains there. It is 160 acres of land, no longer of the public domain, but the property of some American citizen. It becomes taxable immediately. So long as it remains a portion of the public domain either in a forest reserve or whether a reserve at all, it produces no revenue, either to the United States Government or to the inhabitants of the States in which it is situated.

Mr. President, to discuss this conservation question, this reservation of public lands, from the practical standpoint of dollars and cents alone, if you pursue this policy which you have started out on; if you restrict the acquisition by the people of the public lands of homesteads in this western country of ours, I say to you as the representative of one of the most magnificent States in this great Union, with coal fields more extensive than those which exist in the entire State of Pennsylvania, with iron mines as extensive as can be found in the Old Range and the Mesabi Range—I say to you, pursue this policy a little further to its logical conclusion and you have admitted into this great Union of States a State which will necessarily come before Congress and ask you to appropriate for us the money with which to pay the salaries of our State officers and to conduct our courts. You leave us no taxable property. You have taken from New Mexico 10,000,000 acres out of 78,000,000 acres of the very best land, because timber does not grow where moisture does not fall. You have taken from New Mexico and the homesteaders of the United States 10,000,000 acres of the land which is best fitted for homes in the State of New Mexico. We, the people of New Mexico, build roads by which you may reach that land. We, the people of New Mexico, tax ourselves to establish public schools and to maintain them. We, the people of New Mexico, tax ourselves to support courts and to administer justice. Not one dollar does the United States give us of revenue from the forest reserves. Except 25 per cent of what we ourselves pay into the various reserves, we derive no benefit or income from the forest reserves.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FALL. With pleasure.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator give the date when these 10,000,000 acres were, as he says, taken away from New Mexico or from the homesteaders?

Mr. FALL. Within the last 10 years.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator give the date?

Mr. FALL. They are still creating forest reserves; so I can not give any date. They have been at it for about 10 years, and they are still maintaining the practice.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I assume, if it was taken away, the Senator must be able to state when it was taken away, and by whom.

Mr. FALL. I say within the last 10 years and by the executive department. I presume the Senator wants me to say by what President.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator might say that.

Mr. FALL. I can say to the Senator that a large portion of this public domain of ours was taken away under the Executive order of a man who I believe is one of the greatest men whom the United States has ever produced, Hon. Theodore Roosevelt.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator thinks he would be a desirable man to be elected again as President of the United States?

Mr. FALL. I think at least that he is a man to whom you can talk, and when you convince him or show him that a forest reserve should be withdrawn, I believe he will do it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can the Senator state for what length of time those lands were open to settlement before there was that tragic taking away of those acres from homestead entry and settlement?

Mr. FALL. Some of them had been open for a great many years; but under the Cleveland administration of affairs, commencing about the year 1884, when most of the Americans began to go in there, they were hounded under the administration of the Interior Department during that administration, so that they were for years afraid to undertake to acquire 160 acres anywhere.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator in his last statement has covered the ground I originally rose to call attention to. In my judgment this important matter is so far removed from year-to-year politics that it ought not to be considered in that connection.

It is known to every Senator on the floor that no matter what political party has been in power, this policy has been maintained. It is known to every man upon the floor that it was first inaugurated by a Democratic President under an act of Congress. It is known to everybody on the floor that it has been carried forward by the successors of that Democratic President under acts of Congress. What we are calling attention to is not that one political party or another has done wrong, but we are calling attention to the intolerable condition that exists with the hope that the Congress of the United States will at least rise out of the current of political consideration and give some attention to the welfare of the country.

Mr. FALL. I thank the Senator from Wyoming. Senators will acquit me of having attempted to interject politics into this discussion or of having referred to politics or to any President of the United States of my own motion.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FALL. With pleasure.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I merely wanted to suggest, in reply to the Senator from Wyoming, that the Forestry Service was not created, I think, until after 1900, and that is the system, I believe, which is being so severely criticized.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The first forest reserves that were made were made under President Cleveland.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am speaking of the creation of forest rangers and the forestry system as it is now.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course, having made a forest reserve, somebody had to be employed to care for it.

Mr. FALL. If gentlemen want a political discussion, if they think there is anything to be made out of it, I want to say to them that I was in New Mexico during the Cleveland administration and that I could tell you some things of the administration of the land laws under that administration which would appall you. I can tell you things that occurred there then under that administration worse than anything which we have had since. If the Senate wants to listen to a discussion of matters of that kind, I can give it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course, the Senator realizes that Grover Cleveland will never again be President of the United States.

Mr. FALL. Some other gentleman will be elected.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Possibly the Senator from New Mexico will be able to reconcile his great admiration for the ex-President, Theodore Roosevelt, with his strong criticism of probably his strongest and most dominant policy.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I do not——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Will the Senator allow me just a moment? I do not want to be understood as criticizing Mr. Cleveland or anybody else for the creation of these reserves. I approve them. But while the conditions were so bad in New Mexico at the time the Senator suggests, I believe he was a part of the Cleveland administration.

Mr. FALL. During the second administration of Mr. Cleveland I was appointed on the bench of New Mexico. If the Senator wants personalities interjected into the debate, I will state that, without my asking for the appointment but upon the request of certain citizens of New Mexico, Mr. Cleveland did appoint me, without my knowledge, and I resigned just as soon as I could get out of it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. FALL. With pleasure.

Mr. ASHURST. The distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] stated that President Cleveland was the first President to inaugurate forest reserves. I desire to state that under the administration of President Harrison the law was enacted providing that the President could create forest reserves, and I desire to read a part of that act. It is the act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes." Under section 24 of that act, reserves were created by President Harrison. Among the last things that President Harrison did in his term of office was to create a forest reserve. It was done under section 24 of that act, which reads:

SEC. 24. That the President of the United States may, from time to time, set apart and reserve, in any State or Territory having public land bearing forests, in any part of the public lands wholly or in part covered with timber or undergrowth whether of commercial value or not, as public reservations, and the President shall by public proclamation declare the establishment of such reservations and the limits thereof.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. FALL. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from Arizona is not telling the Senator from Wyoming anything new. The Senator from Wyoming is very well aware of the time when the act was passed. The Senator from Wyoming is also aware that forest reserves were created under that law. He is further aware of the fact—which, perhaps, the Senator from Arizona is not aware of—that they were created under certain definite rules and regulations of the Interior Department, which provided that before a forest reserve should be declared the people should have an opportunity to be heard as to whether there should be a forest reserve created or not. Those rules provided that there should be publication made that such a reserve was contemplated. I remember perfectly well when that policy was first departed from, when millions and millions of acres were reserved. I want to say, however, before I refer to that, that Congress went so far as to provide a fund by which the President could investigate and send a commission over the Western States, finding proper places for forest reserves, and that that commission came back and made its report to the President.

The first that we knew of the wholesale creation of reserves was when we had read or discussed in the Senate the proclamation creating reserves upon which the commission themselves had confessedly never been, where they confessed themselves that they did not know whether there was timber in the proposed reservation or not. That was under the Secretary of the Interior in Grover Cleveland's administration.

I regret to say that that policy has been substantially pursued ever since. No attention whatever has been paid from time to time to the character of the land included in the forest reserves, and it does not make any difference whether it has been a Republican administration or a Democratic administration; the policy has been to create the reserves. That is what some of us are complaining of; and, my Democratic friends, it makes no difference whether you are wronged under a Republican or a Democratic administration; it makes no difference to me whether I am wronged under a Republican or a Democratic administration; I want, if possible, to have that wrong corrected, and it makes no difference to me whether it is corrected under a Republican or a Democratic administration. It is something that means life or death to the country. It is a matter that rises above the personality of any man. It is a matter that rises above the politics of any man.

I beseech Senators to deal with these questions as you would deal with your own hearthstones, because you are really dealing with ours. I beseech you not to pay attention to any political differences in this matter, but to consider what you would do for your own homes. That is what we are considering. Lay aside all idea as to the administration under which it was done. It makes no difference under what administration these wrongs were carried on; the only thing for me is to right them when I have the opportunity, with malice toward none, but with the earnest desire to make possible every man's right and to make possible a home for every man.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Mexico will proceed.

Mr. FALL. The Senator from Nebraska doubtless reserves to himself exactly what I reserve to myself. He may admire a man, and whatever he may think of the man politically he may not always agree with him. What I am here to say and to do on every occasion is under my convictions, and it makes no difference to me who is President of the United States or entertains convictions to the contrary. So I may admire a man as a great man, and I may not approve of some of his measures, some of his theories or ideas, and when I do not approve them, as a Senator in this body or as a private citizen out of these Halls I reserve the right to criticize him and to disagree with him.

Mr. President, as I said a while ago, if the Senators from Oregon and Nebraska care to have forest reserves created or maintained in their States, except as a citizen of the United States that is a matter of indifference to me. If they choose to maintain or to advocate or support the present policy, if they choose to turn their public domain into a grazing field to be parceled out by the Government, if they choose to deal with this bureaucratic Government which we have now for the next 15, 20, 40, or 100 years, in so far as we in New Mexico are concerned at least, it is their privilege. This is a great free government of States. But so far as New Mexico is concerned, I speak for New Mexico, Mr. President, irrespective of the politics of its citizens. I am going to speak directly to New Mexico and of New Mexico.

The Senator from Iowa asked a very pertinent question yesterday, why we did not offer some concrete suggestion; why we did not offer to the Senate of the United States something upon which they might act in granting us relief from the evils of which we complain. I will say to the Senator that I have only been here a short time, and it is very contrary to my own desire that I should be now attempting to address this body. I say to the Senator that I will offer at the proper time something which I consider should be adopted, something which will give us relief from the conditions under which we are now suffering. But at the present time, Mr. President, anything which we may offer in the nature of relief will very possibly meet with the fate of the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho. It will go down under a point of order, as it may be called legislation. I shall offer an amendment to the present bill couched in such terms and, as I believe, so fair and just that no Senator here will raise the point of order against it. At least I hope that he will not. I propose to offer an amendment to this bill that in so far as the forest reserves in New Mexico are concerned the title may still remain in the United States, that they may still remain under the laws of the United States and under the rules and regulations of the Department of Agriculture, but I will ask the Senate to say that the administration of those forest reserves in New Mexico, at least, shall be placed in the hands of the State authorities, to be administered under the laws of the United States and the rules and regulations of the department, and under the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture, exactly as they are administered to-day.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will allow me, Mr. President, what provision does he make for the expenses of the administration by the State?

Mr. FALL. That we will pay every dollar of the expenses and we will not come here before you asking you to appropriate one cent, and that we will administer those forest reserves under the laws of the United States, under the rules and regulations of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Can the Senator tell me how much the United States Government pays now from the Federal Treasury in support of the forest reserves in his State?

Mr. FALL. I have the figures here and I will read them in a few moments; but the Federal Government during the last three years has paid approximately $300,000 for the support of the forest reserves in New Mexico, and the people of New Mexico have paid $300,000 in addition for the maintenance of those forest reserves. We will take them for the income which we may get from them and administer them without one dollar of cost to the Government of the United States, and administer them under exactly the same rules and regulations which govern the administration of the forest reserves in every other State in the Union.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I presume the Senator would reserve to the State what the Government now takes?

Mr. FALL. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. In other words, in the administration of your forest reserves you would take the contract as a State to administer a forest reserve just as it is now administered and it would cost the General Government nothing?

Mr. FALL. That is exactly covered in the proposed amendment which I shall offer.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. FALL. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator from what sources he would expect to obtain revenue?

Mr. FALL. I will show the Senator the figures and the facts, and I will convince the Senator, I think, absolutely that we can derive under the present laws an income more than double that which is derived now and administer the forest reserves to the satisfaction of the people of New Mexico and of the United States.

Mr. President, before reaching that part of my subject, I want simply to call the attention of Senators to the fact that laws which are passed for this great Union as a whole sometimes are not applicable to a certain subdivision of the Union. Homestead laws which are applicable to the people or to the lands of the great Middle West and of the South and even as far west as the great Rocky Mountain region and the State of Idaho are not applicable either in the State which I represent or which is represented by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They are not suitable.

Mr. FALL. They are not suitable, as suggested by the Senator from Georgia. These matters are lost sight of sometimes, Mr. President, in the deliberations of this body and of the other House of Congress, and they are certainly almost invariably lost sight of in the administration of the laws by the bureau which now governs the people of the United States in these matters.

Mr. President, New Mexico had her own laws, her own civilization, dealt with her own conditions, knew what they were and met them as they arose, long before the Pilgrims landed on Plymouth Rock. We have the oldest civilization in this great Union in the State of New Mexico. We have under the old Spanish laws the most wonderful system of communal government ever built up. The great Rio Grande, rising in Colorado and seeking its way to the Gulf, cuts New Mexico in half from north to south, and along every mile of that great river grants were made to the people who would go in there and colonize. There were communal grants under the system of government established by Spain, and I say it was the most beneficent system of government ever established on this continent. Those grants were made to actual settlers, not to one individual, not to some speculator who might colonize them, but they were made to actual settlers, who might go there and open and carve out of them homes.

Under the system of those grants the agricultural lands susceptible of irrigation were allotted in severalty by commissioners appointed by the granting power. As to other lands, the grants were always made large enough to take in more than the agricultural allotments. The other lands lying within the boundaries of those grants were divided into grazing lands and into timberlands. Under the system devised by these old Spaniards every man upon one of these grants owned in his own right in fee simple his little plot of agricultural land. Altogether, as a community, they owned an irrigation system which they took out of the rivers. Together, as a community, they owned the grazing privileges upon those lands extending beyond the confines of the particular allotments. As a community they owned the timberlands, from which they could get the necessary firewood and building material.

Now, came the great Government of the United States a few years since, after having recognized all these grants by solemn treaty, and established a court of private land claims for the adjudication of titles. Under technicalities of the law every one of those communal grants was cut absolutely down to an agricultural allotment in severalty. The grazing lands, which those people and their ancestors had used for 300 years, were taken away from them. The timberland, from which they obtained their fuel and their building material, was taken away from them.

What was done? The executive department of this great Government immediately threw forest reserves around those little allotments, and to-day if a descendant of one of those people who lived there 300 years ago desires to get firewood, to pick up limbs from the ground, fallen and dead timber, he must go sometimes 60 miles to some little fellow sent out from this great Federal Government of ours at Washington and seek from him a permit to pay a minimum of 60 cents a load for that fallen and dead timber and limbs fallen from the trees.

Senators talk about the German system. Mr. President, under the forestry system in Germany the peasants—and there are peasants there and we certainly hope that we will not have a peasantry system here—the peasants go upon those forests and pick up the leaves from the ground for the purpose of making fire with which to cook their food. Every little twig as large as a finger is removed from the ground under the peasantry system in Germany, where they have the great magnificent forest reserves of which we have heard so much.

And here when an American citizen undertakes to take a stick of wood fallen from a tree he is fined and in some instances prosecuted in the United States courts. To-day the descendants of the people who came across the country in 1541 can not go away from their little homes without crossing an Indian reservation or a forest reserve, and when they strike the line of that Indian reservation or that forest reserve they are met by some hanger-on of one of these Washington bureaus who charges them for the water which they themselves drink, the water which their horses drink, the water which their sheep and their cattle drink in crossing over these lines, and then they charge them for the grass which the stock will eat in going to their ranges, either upon the public domain or upon the private lands belonging to the stock owners.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FALL. With pleasure.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Is it not true that the policy of the Forestry Service was to make a right of way through there, a confined right of way to drive cattle and sheep over to water, and that the cattlemen and sheepmen preferred to pay something to do away with that restricted right of way, so that they could graze their sheep and cattle to and from the water?

Mr. FALL. In New Mexico that is absolutely incorrect. I have here a letter from one of the very descendants of the men of whom I have been speaking, one of the prominent men of that State, in which he is complaining of the very fact that, while we tax ourselves to build the roads up to the lines of the forest reserves, those in charge of the forest reserves and of the Indian reserves will not build roads across their boundaries and will not let us do it; they will not let us tax ourselves to build the roads that they use, as I will read to satisfy the Senator. This refers partly to an Indian reservation:

> We have got to go out of business unless we can have the Indian reservation reduced to its former size—

He is writing me with reference to a particular Indian reserve, but he refers also to forest reserves—> which, to say the least about its extension, is an outrage to the stockmen of this county; we wish you to take up this matter at your convenience and investigate what can be done to remedy this evil; also if it is going to take a good deal of time to secure the cancellation of the order extending this Indian reservation, we would welcome at least the roadway proposition.

Somebody should build a road across these reserve lands, he goes on—it may be of some interest to the Senate to have me read a little further—to say:

> The Indian Office has a gang of employees there watching the sheep herders, bulldozing them, and annoying them with their foolish rules and regulations, charging them exorbitant fees for crossing permits, and in every way making life miserable for the sheep men. There is an idea prevalent amongst these employees of the Government, prevalent almost in all the departments having anything to do with the public lands—Bureau of Forestry and Indian Department—that they must prejudice themselves first against the sheep and the owners thereof. Predatory animals, according to their notions, are not a circumstance when it comes to sheep.

These are the facts, Senators. The conservation of the natural resources of New Mexico means a restriction upon the individual; means that he must not acquire a homestead in the most habitable portion of the State; and means that upon such forest reserves and Indian reserves the gentle bear, the mountain lion, and the timber wolf are conserved, so that they may attack his herds, his cattle, and his sheep. That is conservation in New Mexico.

I was speaking, Mr. President, of the conditions relating to New Mexico particularly. I want to say a little something further about the geographical conditions. I said yesterday, while interrupting the Senator from Idaho, that timber in New Mexico grows not below an altitude of 6,000 feet. That is true. Merchantable timber, pine and other timber fit for use in commerce, fit for preservation for the future generations, of whom we so anxiously speak—timber of that character grows above 6,000 feet. I do not know what are the climatic conditions in Oregon; I am not undertaking to speak for Oregon; but I can say to Senators here that, in so far as New Mexico is concerned, the only land in the entire State of New Mexico which is fit for habitation—upon which a man can make a home without irrigating from water brought from the mountains or from the streams or dug out of the earth—is land above an elevation of 6,000 feet.

Where timber grows, moisture falls; where moisture falls, you can raise crops; where timber does not grow, it is because of the lack of moisture; and where timber does not grow crops will not grow, except through the aid of artificial irrigation. Those are the conditions that we have there.

I am not intending, Mr. President, to undertake to cover this whole public-land question; I am not going to undertake now to offer any solution of the difficulties which we are meeting every day, but I am referring to conditions as they exist in New Mexico. I am not going to ask you even to change the laws with reference to the administration of the forest reserves of New Mexico; I am simply going to ask you, as an act of justice, to give those forest reserves to the charge of the people who know what a forest reserve is.

I am going to impose upon the patience of Senators for a few moments to show what has been done with reference to the administration of forest reserves in the State of New Mexico. I have the figures here for the last three years; I can tell you what it has cost; I will show you what revenue we have derived; and you can see what you have been compelled to appropriate. Then I shall make the proposition, as I have suggested to you, that we will take these forest reserves, administer them under the same laws and the same rules and regulations, and before I get through I will convince you that we can not only do it, but that we can make good money out of it and not call upon you for a cent.

During the three years from about June, 1909, up to and including 1911, the New Mexico national forests produced a gross revenue of $360,213.09; from timber sales a total of $92,510.70; from timber settlements—where some man had inadvertently cut a tree, having crossed over the line—$157; timber trespass—where he had gone over and cut under a sawmill project—$3,000. You talk about this being a grazing country or a forest country, and yet while there was derived from timber sales $92,510.70, there was derived from grazing fees $253,556—this is a forest reserve—and for grazing trespass $3,000. But Senators know where the money goes; where the money that you are asked under this bill to appropriate for New Mexico goes.

This [exhibiting] is the column of expenditures. Salaries during the same time were $379,557; travel, $32,564; rent, $38,114; telephone construction, and so forth, $18,056; corral fences, $10,176.

Forest planting. Here is the great object of conservation. In the administration of a forest reserve you are supposed to take from that forest reserve only the dead or dying timber or the mature timber, leaving for future generations the natural growth of the timber as it comes, and for every tree which you take off you are supposed to put a tree back. What is the object of these forest reserves? For what purpose are they set aside? To maintain the natural growth of the timber as a method of obtaining revenue? You sell from the forest reserves the fallen timber, the wind-shaken timber, the mature timber, and you are supposed to replant, and where trees do not naturally grow to make them grow.

What else are we paying this money into the national forest-reserve fund for? For what other purpose are we paying in $360,000—the citizens of New Mexico, not the citizens of the United States generally? You are paying $300,000, but we ourselves are paying $360,000. For what purpose? Show us that they are making trees grow where no trees grew before, and we will pay the money cheerfully; we will tax ourselves to do it to protect our children as we have been taxing ourselves without any assistance from the United States Government for over 60 years since we came into the Union.

How much have they expended out of the total expenditure directly? Five hundred and ninety-eight thousand and thirty-five dollars and twenty-one cents—$360,000 paid in by the citizens of New Mexico. They have expended during all the time they have had charge of these forest reserves a total of $22,000 for reforestation—tree planting. They have expended a grand total in New Mexico of $22,000; and we, the citizens of New Mexico, ourselves have paid that $360,000, and the Congress of the United States have contributed to their salary list $300,000 more. They have actually spent $22,000, and they have actually grown, so they claim, 34 acres of trees!

This is a magnificent business enterprise. If you are not running this Forest Service as a business enterprise for the present and future generations, I ask you What is the purpose of the forest-reserve law? Why do you reserve these forests?

I say to you—and I know that I shall be criticized for giving utterance to such sentiments—I say to you, Senators, that better it were for New Mexico if every acre of this 10,000,000 acres of land in New Mexico had been stolen by some "malefactor of great wealth" than that they should remain in the condition in which they are at the present time, simply as a source of revenue for a lot of little clerks from a bureau in Washington. I say to you that if they were stolen, they could not be removed; that if the timber were cut from them, it must be put to some use; that railroads would be built; that wagon roads would be built; that sawmills would be put up; that men would be employed; and little thrifty cities would grow up all over New Mexico, if we could use our forests. Under the present condition they are simply used, as I say, as a source of revenue, purely and simply to pay clerks, and a lot of incompetent clerks; men who never saw a pine tree grow outside of a lawn; men who never saw anything in the nature of grass grow except that which has been planted around your statues here in your public squares in Washington; men who never saw a cow except in a picture book; men who regard, as my New Mexican friend says, a sheep as a predatory animal; and such men are sent out there to administer for us this great domain.

Senators, I do not believe that, understanding these conditions, the Congress of the United States will perpetuate such a system of government.

Where do the streams rise from which come the life-giving waters of which the Senator from Nevada is always ready to speak? They rise in the mountains, where the moisture falls, where the snow falls, where the timber grows. These are the sources of our streams, and we are not objecting to such conservation as will prevent the denuding of those mountains of their timber. Thence these streams have their source.

Some of you do not know the conditions existing in the West; but I will say to you now that we have streams, bold, pure, and with a volume of water sufficient to irrigate hundreds of, and in some instances, thousands of acres of land, which, when they leave the foothills of the mountains, sink into the desert sand and are never seen again.

Some of you do not know that the southern portion of New Mexico and of Arizona is a great basin country, the last part of the American Continent to appear above the waters of the sea, the Continental Divide running through it, although it is the lowest part of the continent, and streams rising in Mexico flowing north almost to the American boundary and sinking in the sand, and streams rising in New Mexico, close even to the Rio Grande, which empties into the Gulf, flowing directly south toward the streams which are flowing from the north in Mexico and sinking into the sand.

Take the rivulet or the little stream of water by the use of which a homesteader could cultivate 40, 100, 200, or 300 acres, in connection with other homesteaders, rising in the mountains, in the forest reserves, flowing down the canyon, and instead of being used it sinks in the sand. Why? Because under the administration of the Forest Service the forest reserves have been invariably thrown around the foot of the mountains until they took in every drop of the living waters. At these places no trees grow; the boundaries may be 5, 8, 10, or 50 miles from a tree, but these gentlemen, with an eye to the main chance, knowing whence their salaries must come, anxious not to call upon Congress for too much money, have taken $253,000 in the last three years from the people of New Mexico for grazing permits, simply because otherwise the people of New Mexico could not get water for their stock. I say to you, Senators, now that not one-third of the revenue derived from forest reserves in New Mexico came from the timbered lands themselves. Without fear of contradiction, I can assure you that two-thirds of this $253,000 came entirely from lands which never had a stick of timber larger than your wrist growing upon them, and which never will have. The people are excluded; they can not take up a little homestead; they can not utilize these waters, because, although you call yourself a free citizen of the United States, you can not go upon a forest reserve, dig a ditch, and utilize the water which is sinking in the sand and not being used by anyone. Why? Because some representative of this bureaucratic Government will stop you when you cross the line and do as he did to another New Mexican friend of mine, not only collect from him $13 damages for trespassing, but then write a letter to this great bureau in Washington, have the case turned over to the United States Attorney General, and a criminal action brought against him for trespass where they said he had done $13 worth of damage.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to ask the Senator whether the springs and small streams to which he refers are withdrawn as a part of the forest reservations or under an Executive order recently issued?

Mr. FALL. They are withdrawn under the forest regulations.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I find in the San Francisco Journal of Commerce of May 6, 1912, if the Senator will permit me, a statement which I should like to read, and perhaps he can explain it. It is as follows:

GOVERNMENT COMES TO RELIEF OF THE SMALL STOCK RAISERS.

Withdrawal of public lands for use rather than from use is the latest piece of practical conservation. The President, by Executive order, under the withdrawal law has withdrawn from entry many tracts of unappropriated public lands which contain springs or small streams. These watering places control the public range over large areas in Utah and Wyoming, and the withdrawal of these lands will in no wise interfere with the use of the springs or streams, but will, in fact, insure the possibility of public use. Control of watering places by strong private interests and the resultant monopolization of grazing on the public domain are believed to be prejudicial to public interest, and the President regards the setting aside of these watering places for public use as serving a distinct and beneficial public purpose, in harmony not only with the letter but with the spirit of the act of 1910.

The three withdrawals already approved by the President represent an aggregate area of about 80,000 acres in six counties in Utah and Wyoming, and include tracts of public land known from the records of the United States Geological Survey and the General Land Office to contain 248 springs and streams.

It is well known that in the Rocky Mountain and Pacific Coast States there are many large areas of excellent grazing land in which the number of places where water for man or beast can be obtained is relatively small. Sometimes the shortest distance between "water holes" is 10, 20, or even 50 miles. Some of these watering places are springs, some of them ponds of alkaline water, some of them small streams flowing down from adjacent hills or mountains and becoming lost on the edge of the desert. The lands in large part support a growth of grass and small brush which is excellent fodder for horses, cattle, or sheep, and as practically all these areas are Government land they are "free range" for whoever may care to graze his stock thereon. However, stock can not live without water, and unless watering places are available to a stock owner it is impossible for him to utilize the range.

As a result of these conditions it has come to be common practice in some parts of the West for a big cattle or sheep outfit to obtain possession of the few scattered water holes in a certain area and by this means to monopolize the grazing privilege almost as effectively as if it actually owned every acre of the area. In consequence the small stock owner has been placed at a serious disadvantage and in many localities has been forced out of business.

This practical development of the conservation policy in order to prevent monopolization of the public grazing lands will not only insure equal opportunity under present conditions, but it prepares the way for future legislation. Should Congress at any future time decide to pass a grazing law the retention of these watering places in public ownership will make the enactment of a satisfactory law possible; whereas if the water should pass into private hands the framing of a law providing for the control of grazing on the public domain would be useless, because the law itself would be inoperative.

The present action will really be beneficial to both large and small stock growers, although it will doubtless not be pleasing to those who desire to exclude rivals from the range by acquiring the watering places themselves. The competition and struggle for existence have in many places, however, grown so keen that even to the largest outfits the strife has become burdensome, and to some of them, at least, the removal of one of the causes of contention by the reservation of the springs and streams for the common use of all will be a decided relief. To the small stockman who has been fighting for existence and who has seen his grazing area diminish year by year as he has been barred from this spring or from that stream it will be welcome news that the Government has taken steps that will at least make the competition fairer.

This clipping was handed to me in connection with some discussion of this matter that arose yesterday with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], who complained of the withdrawal of these watering places.

Mr. FALL. Answering the Senator as an Irishman would, I will ask him if he can tell me of any one instance in all his experience where anything, water, land, or timber was withdrawn from the public domain, segregated, and put in charge of the representatives of one of your governmental bureaus, that the people were ever able to use it without such restrictions as to render its use practically impossible.

Mr. NEWLANDS. All that I can say to the Senator is that I know of nothing to the contrary; but I can not say that I have had a very wide observation.

Mr. FALL. I am speaking, Mr. President, with due respect, from a personal, physical knowledge of the conditions and the country of which I am talking, gained from 30 years of experience, living with it, punching cattle over it, making homesteads on it, cultivating it, building ditches, cutting timber, trying to get railroads to go in, building them there at a cost of millions of dollars, and then having them stopped, having little towns which had been built up, some of them as beautiful towns as were ever built anywhere in any State of this Union, cut off and absolutely destroyed, because of the action of some representative of the Interior Department of the United States or of the Judiciary Department of the United States in bringing injunction suits and stopping those works, as they have been stopped from one end of New Mexico to the other. That has been my experience with this bureaucratic form of government. Never will it be extended one inch beyond what it is now, so long as my vote can prevent.

Mr. President, I have never heard of any such order as the one to which the Senator from Nevada has just referred. We know nothing about those orders; but we do know that the waters upon our public domain around the edges of the forest reserves and in the forest reserves have been withdrawn for the purpose of paying an income through which Forestry Service employees might draw their salaries. Those are the conditions. We are familiar with them, and if the Senate will listen to me for a few moments I can tell you more about them. I am speaking of my personal knowledge. I have a spring adjoining my ranch in New Mexico, situated on the edge of the Sacramento Mountains, 1 mile east of the Mescalero Indian Reserve. A spring in that section is quite well known all over the country, because you make your day's journey, or did in the old days, from spring to spring.

This is one of the best-known watering places in New Mexico. It has been used and occupied by passers-by, cattlemen, sheepmen, and mining prospectors, particularly by mining prospectors, for 40 years; it has been patented for 27 years by the United States Government; but a few years ago this great, munificent Government of ours created a forest reserve south of the Mescalero Indian Reserve and included a strip 20 miles long from north to south on the west of the Mescalero Indian Reserve ranging from a quarter of a mile wide to three-quarters of a mile wide at the widest place. That strip took in every spring, every drop of water for that 20 miles, although every drop of it—every spring—was covered by patented lands belonging to citizens of the United States. There was not a stick of timber growing upon this land, and no attempt even was made to say that it could ever be grown there; there was no forest on it; and it was not adjoining a forest, but was merely a little tongue of land running along by the Indian reserve. It was included in the reserve simply for the purpose of taking in the springs and making the owners of those springs pay tribute to the Forestry Bureau of the great United States Government, for no good purpose, except for the great end of paying salaries. There is not enough ground in this little strip to graze stock upon; nobody pretends to graze stock upon this little strip of ground; but adjoining it there is a public domain embracing thirty, forty, or fifty thousand acres, which you gave to the Territory of New Mexico under the provision that they might lease it. It has been leased, and the lessees of that ground have been using the springs to which I have referred for watering their stock; but through the creation of a so-called forest reserve their stock was cut off. For what purpose? In order that they might be compelled to take out for grazing their stock upon this quarter of a mile of land an annual permit of 35 cents a head for a cow walking over that ground and 10 cents a head for the sheep—not really for grazing them, for the cattle do not go upon this forest-reserve strip except in going backward and forward from their usual grazing grounds to get water. That is a specimen of the administration of the forest reserves of New Mexico.

Mr. President, I am not going to continue this statement much further. I want to say that the Mescalero Apache Indian Reserve, of which I speak, adjoins on the north the Alamo Forest Reserve, both in my county in New Mexico. The forest on the Alamo Reserve, situated in this county, is about the same in extent as the Indian reserve.

Now, let us see how the two reserves are administered in so far as grazing is concerned, and I call your attention to this because I want to show you that I know what I am talking about when I say that New Mexico can take her forest reserves and make them pay a great income to her schools, to her courts, and for building roads, and yet not charge the Government of the United States one cent, and administer these forest reserves under the laws which you have passed and under the regulations which have been promulgated by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Four hundred and eighty thousand acres are contained in this Mescalero Reservation, and the Indians on that reservation have over 11,000 sheep, which they graze, belonging to themselves. They have, I will say, about 8,000 head of cattle. They have something like the same number of horses. All of the stock has free grazing.

Now, to take care of this stock, to see that the Indians, who are scarcely capable of handling their own business, have their business handled for them in a businesslike way, there is a stockman appointed and two Indians as his assistants, the Indians working for six months in the year. They are paid $480 a piece. The stockman is paid $1,000, and he looks after all of this Indian stock. He sees that under the laws of the United States and of New Mexico the sheep are dipped at least once a year, that they may enjoy health. He sees that the wool clip of the sheep is sold to the best possible advantage of the Indians. He sees that the lambs are sold to their best possible advantage. He and his assistants perform all this duty. Then the lands not used by the Mescalero Indians are rented or leased to citizens desiring them for grazing purposes.

The total cost of the grazing crew upon the Indian reserve is less than $1,500 per year, handling all their own stock and clearing $8,000 revenue from the present permits issued to other people. In other words, they derive an income of $6,500 net over and above all expenses from grazing permits issued to outsiders, after allowing the Indians an opportunity to graze free.

What is done on the Alamo Reserve? You are asked here not only to give them all they get, but you are asked to appropriate $6,500 per year for running that reserve; and I happen to know, although not from the report here, that the income from the entire Alamo Reserve is less than $2,500, while you are appropriating $6,500 for it.

Why is this? It is something they do not know. They could not tell you. I defy any Senator here to go to an agent on any forest reserve in Mexico—the Alamo or anywhere else—and get from him any information as to why this is. He does not know. He is ignorant about it. They grant simply permits, not leases. The consequence is that they will put 20 men with little herds of sheep or cattle all upon the same ground, all fighting over the same spring, all quarreling about water, all quarreling about the division of the range, throwing the sheep at large upon the range. They do not know what every cattleman knows and what every sheepman knows, that when you have a range fenced and divided into pastures the same range will run nearly four times as many as if it is an open range.

On the Indian reserve they have the range divided into pastures. They can pay more for grazing permits upon the Indian reserve because it is divided into pastures, and they can run two or three or four times as many sheep as upon the same number of acres just across the line where it is open.

So you will see that one reserve is administered with a proper conception of the question, and the other is administered for the purpose of paying salaries to a lot of 2 by 4 clerks.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask what is the relative size of these two reserves?

Mr. FALL. I thought I stated that in my opening. The Alamo Forest Reserve is composed of two sections. That section of the Alamo Forest Reserve upon which sheep permits are issued is about the same area as the Indian reserve to which I have referred.

Then there is another forest reserve down on the Texas line which used to be known as the Guadalupe Reserve, but has lately been changed to Alamo, and it is administered from Albuquerque, the district office, by the same parties who administer the Alamo Reserve, and those parties are paid by the Congress out of the appropriation made, and I defy you or anyone else to find out how much they are paid.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I understand the Senator to contend that the Indian Service is conducted with much greater economy than the Forestry Service.

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir. I want to say that the Indian Service in that particular locality, in the Mescalero Indian Reserve, under the administration of Capt. Carroll, has been most successful from every standpoint.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me ask the Senator this: I believe he states that the administration of the Indian reserve is different from that of the forest reserve; that in the latter permits only are granted, and that the grazing area is covered by a number of proprietors of herds.

Mr. FALL. Without any system.

Mr. NEWLANDS. On the contrary, the Indian reserve is left to one interest.

Mr. FALL. Oh, no; to various interests.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But each interest is segregated in its holdings.

Mr. FALL. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Why should not that system be pursued by the Forestry Service?

Mr. FALL. That is just exactly what I have been complaining of, and what I am complaining of now—the administration of the forest reserves—because you send men from Washington to administer our forest reserves who do not know a cow when they see one and think a sheep a predatory animal.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The difference in the cost of the two systems does not arise from a disposition, perhaps a mistaken one from the official point of view, to give the small raisers, the owners of small herds, an equal opportunity to graze their stock?

Mr. FALL. Did you intend to use that word "equal"? Did you ever see the Use Book? It does not use the word "equal."

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not know, I am sure.

Mr. FALL. The Use Book, adopted by the department for the administration of the Forestry Service, says that the little man shall have the preference right, not an equal right. It does not make any difference how long the other man has been there and whether he owns the water or does not, the little man shall have the preference.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask whether that system of preferring the little man does not necessarily result in a more expensive administration of the range?

Mr. FALL. Not if it were properly carried out. If these corrals and fences on which they have expended something over $10,000 were for the purpose of protecting the range or getting a better income, it would not result in the expenditure of another dollar. But all these improvements are made for the benefit of the Government employees and not for the benefit of the Forest Service. Every corral is a fence for their saddle horses, and every improvement is for themselves individually.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator speaks of better service in the immediate proximity between the Indians' side of this reserve and the forest-reserve side.

Mr. FALL. I am not saying much in favor of the Indians' side, either, I want the Senator to understand.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I was about to ask if that is not an exceptional case, and whether it is not due to an exceptional agent.

Mr. FALL. It is the result of having a man of common sense, who has studied the conditions and who in the employment of his men has employed practical cow and stock men instead of having a $60-a-month clerk from Washington to tell us how to run our range.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I want to find out whether I have the correct idea of this 35 cents a head. Do I understand the Senator to say that the 35 cents a head is paid, not for pasturage, but is paid simply for the use of a path connecting the pasturage with a spring, the pasturage being owned by the State and the spring being owned by a private individual?

Mr. FALL. Yes; in this way——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is there a lease of some land or is it the easement of some cow path for which they pay 35 cents a head?

Mr. FALL. They ostensibly charge you a lease permit of 35 cents a head per year for the total number of cattle that will water at that spring. They know the cattle could not graze there without water. They are simply taking advantage of conditions, and they have thrown the forest reserve about it for that purpose.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is, in fact, paying 35 cents for the use of the old cow path?

Mr. FALL. Yes; with the old cow going backward and forward.

If Senators will read this bill fully, they will find one or two remarkable things in it. There is a provision in it that none of this appropriation made for the construction and maintenance of houses shall be used for the maintenance or construction of houses used by the forest-reserve agent where such houses are situated on any inclosed field of a homesteader who had a homestead prior to the time that this forest reserve was thrown about it.

I am very grateful, and I want to express the gratitude of the people of my country, because in times past we have had the forest agent—if he concluded he needed a part of a homestead, not patented, although it had been segregated long before the forest reserve was thrown around it—to go bodily and take it—all our improvements; not in one instance, but in several.

The Senator from Nevada spoke to me a moment ago and asked if we did not want roads built. In the Lincoln Forest Reserve, in New Mexico, the people of New Mexico finally secured permission to build a road over an old public road built there since the days of Billy the Kid. They secured the gracious permission to build this road at their own cost, and they did it, connecting up several little towns and crossing a forest reserve.

It has not been a year since a neighbor of mine started across the forest reserve, traveling on the public road, and was stopped in the middle of the road and told that he must pay a crossing permit. He explained that he was going through to another place off the reserve and that he would not stop there that night; that he was traveling a public road, belonging to the State of New Mexico. Yet he was held up. They would not allow him to cross. He did cross, but it was over the protest of this particular representative of this bureaucratic Government that happens to have charge of that particular reserve. The man had an old-fashioned six-shooter, which is a pretty good argument, and he finally passed on.

These things are coming up every day. The matter which this man speaks of in this letter which he writes to me is only one of them. They build some of the most beautiful and romantic trails there you ever saw. They take the girls riding over a trail made simply for horses to travel. They do not want any public roads. If there are any built, we tax ourselves and build them ourselves.

I want to say just one word in closing. I am not going to weary your patience longer, Senators.

The Senator from Mississippi yesterday asked a very pertinent question, I thought. He asked the Senator from Wyoming as to the comparison between the administration of the public lands in the public-land States of the United States and the administration of the lands belonging to the great State of Texas. In my peregrinations I once punched cattle in Texas and New Mexico.

Mr. President, the State of Texas has, without any exception, passed the most drastic anticorporation, anticapitalistic laws of any State in this Union. They have gone so far in the matter of their legislation that railroads have threatened even to tear up their tracks and get out of the State. A great railroad system last year announced through the public press that they would not expend the money which they had in their treasury for further road building and the extension of their system in the great State of Texas.

The Texas Legislature passed an act which provided that any simple indebtedness should be deemed exactly the same as a bonded indebtedness when it came to a foreclosure. Their statutes are full of legislation of that kind. They have such restrictive legislation in the matter of corporation bonds and the issue of stock that every railroad which is going to Mexico and can get around the State of Texas goes around it, simply because if they go through any part of Texas they must have a separate bond issue, or if they undertake to make their general bonds applicable to all their lines, including those in Texas, then the bonds must pass the scrutiny of the railroad commission of Texas and be based on the physical valuation of the property.

All these laws, the most restrictive that any legislature has ever adopted, have been adopted by the State of Texas. Capitalists have been saying for years that Texas drove out capital, and yet Texas remains a great Empire State, one of the greatest States in this country; a State progressing in every line of commerce and of industry. Why? Because, sir, she owns her public lands. She owns every acre of land within her boundaries, and when she came into this great Union she reserved to herself the absolute title to every foot of the land within her boundaries. She has made mistakes, just as we have made mistakes. Lands were stolen from Texas, just as they have been stolen from the public domain. Millions of acres of land were given by the Texas Legislature in aid of railroad building, just as we gave millions and millions of acres for the Atlantic & Pacific, the Northern Pacific, the Union Pacific, and other railroad building in the United States. Millions of acres of the finest domain in the world were given away by the State of Texas, and yet she has the greatest public-school fund of any State in the Union. Yet she has the most magnificent courthouses in every little county throughout that great State—an ornament to the county seat—of any in the Union. She has built up her school fund, her courthouses, her public buildings, her great capitol—$15,000,000 paid for it in land—and yet she has given to the people coming into her borders the most liberal land laws ever given to any people.

Instead of restricting the homesteader, instead of saying to him, "We do not want you here; you can come to our boundary and turn and go back," she said "Come in, and instead of giving you a measly 160 acres we will give you 640 acres, and we will let you buy six sections of 640 acres each, at $2 an acre, and give you 40 years' time, at 3 per cent interest, to pay it." She has built up a magnificent Commonwealth. There are no happier or more prosperous people living in the United States than those who inhabit the great State of Texas, and it has been entirely due, and her prosperity has been traceable almost entirely, to her public-land system and the fact that she owned the land and through the ownership it was not tied down. Nobody ever suggested that her people should be a nation of tenant farmers, and I would pity the public man or the private citizen who would suggest to the people of Texas that they reserve the fee in the land.

I say to you, Senators, that the whole theory of this is wrong—absolutely wrong. I agree with the Senator from Idaho that these lands should be turned back to the people. His amendment should be adopted, giving to the people of the States absolutely the public land and let them deal with it.

That is the proper theory, and sooner or later you will come to see it. But in the meantime we people from the West are practical men. If we can not get what we believe is absolutely right, we feel that we are entitled to ask of you some measure of justice, and we ask you simply to give us the administration of the forest reserves in the State of New Mexico and let us administer them under the laws which you have already passed and any such laws as you may pass hereafter. We will not charge you one cent for it. Instead of over $100,000 per year, as you are paying now, we will run them for the benefit of our people. We will pay the expenses from the revenue which we collect. Now, that is all we ask.

I want to read, if I have the permission of the Senate, the amendment which I propose to offer. It is to come on page 52, after line 14, of the committee amendment.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. FALL to the bill (H. R. 18060) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, viz: On page 52, after line 14, insert the following:

"Provided further, That the management, supervision, and administration of the respective forest reserves within the State of New Mexico and of that portion of any such reserve partly within said State shall, subject to all the laws of the United States and of the general rules and regulations hertofore adopted by the Agricultural Department, be devolved upon the State government and officers of the State of New Mexico. The Legislature of New Mexico shall, if the provisions hereof are accepted by a resolution of such body, provide the necessary officers and employees for the care, management, and administration of each of such reserves or parts of reserves. The salary and expense accounts of such officers and employees and all expenses of such care, management, and administration, including reforestation, shall be paid wholly out of the funds derived from the lease of lands and grazing permits, sale of timber, and other sources of revenue from such forest reserves, and no part of any such or any other expense connected with the care, management, or administration of such reserves shall be paid out of the appropriations herein made or by the United States out of any other funds, and any funds remaining after the payment of all expenses as in the proviso set out, shall be paid into the treasury of New Mexico to be expended as provided by the State laws.

"The Secretary of Agriculture shall have the power and he is hereby directed to cause such reserves to be inspected from time to time and shall see that all laws and rules applicable to such reserves are enforced, and shall have the power to suspend any State official or employee failing to enforce such laws and rules and regulations, pending a hearing upon charges to be made by him under his direction to the governor of New Mexico, who shall promptly remove and appoint a successor to any such official or employee against whom such charges are sustained."

Now, Mr. President, I can not see why the Congress of the United States should not at least give us the administration, under the laws as they now exist, of these forest reserves. Take one item alone of expense last year. From the forest reserves in New Mexico last year they sold $42,000 worth of timber. Now not $1 of the expense of travel or salary or any overhead expense or any administration expense or any forest ranger's pay was charged up against these receipts, but there appears upon the return of expenses an item for the sale of timber $12,000—30 per cent over and above all charges of salary of employees, of traveling, of administration, and every other expenditure. Consider that as a business proposition. We can take it; we know how to handle it; we can take it under the supervision of your Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to say this. The suggestion the Senator has just made is a most interesting one and one worthy of serious consideration.

I wish to ask the Senator whether he is prepared now to give his views as to what changes should be made in the existing land laws with a view to doing away with the evil legislation and administration to which he has referred. The Senator heard my contention yesterday, I believe, that the men of the West should confer together and shape a code of laws which they could submit to Congress for its consideration, and I would ask the Senator whether he is prepared now to state what his views would be regarding, first, the forest reserves, should they be continued in any form; second, should coal reserves be continued in any form; and, third, what should be done with the grazing lands, should they be vested in private ownership or kept as a public commons for grazing until provision is made, perhaps, for their irrigation or their settlement under other conditions? I am sure that we have now a very excellent opportunity for conferring together on this bill and exchanging views, and I should be very glad to have the experience of the Senator.

Mr. FALL. I will say to the Senator that I have views, and very decided views, upon each of those propositions, and those views I will take the earliest opportunity of enlightening the Senate upon; but to go into it now in the limited time which I would have would be useless. I would very much prefer that the Senator should excuse me.

I want to say, however, shortly, that never so long as I am here or have a vote anywhere else will I vote to reserve the public lands of the United States from the individual citizens of the United States. Never so long as I have a vote can we get together on any proposition looking to a compromise adverse to the system upon which this Government was founded and create a new system of peasantry—never will my vote be given and never can we get together upon any such proposition.

As to the question of utilizing these public lands and utilizing these grazing lands, my own idea is that a larger amount than the original homestead or even desert-land entry should be given as a grazing homestead, and that the absolute title should pass just as it passes now.

I think the Senator overlooks this proposition. He speaks of withholding minerals, for instance, and of withholding coal. How long are you going to withhold it? Will you ever allow a man a title to his land? Will you ever allow him to feel that his boundaries can not be crossed by anyone seeking to erect a derrick or dig a shaft on his grounds? The present land law places a limit. Under the present homestead laws you must reside for five years upon a homestead before you can get a patent, and at any time prior to the issue of the patent, when it is shown that the land is valuable for mineral, it can be taken and is taken for mineral purposes only.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FALL. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to ask the Senator if his proposed amendment would have the effect, in case it was adopted, of opening up the reserved lands of New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Not at all. As I said, I am simply a practical man trying to get something. I know I can not get what I want.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. So the Senator's amendment would maintain the present boundaries of the reserves as they now stand?

Mr. FALL. Absolutely; and under the law and rules and regulations. We will not interfere with them, because we can not. The Congress of the United States is not yet prepared to do full justice to the people of the West, for whom I speak. I hope and believe that before many years or before many months have rolled around the Congress of the United States will abolish the Department of the Interior of the United States Government and with it the Indian Office.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The reading of the bill will be proceeded with. The next passed over amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 18, before the words "forest rangers," strike out "one hundred and ninety-eight" and insert "two hundred and fifty-two," and in lines 19 and 20 strike out the words "54 forest rangers, at $1,100 each," so as to read:

Two hundred and fifty-two forest rangers, at $1,200 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand that several other Senators desire to speak upon the bill. We can not conclude its consideration to-night. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 1 hour and 25 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 16, 1912, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 15, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by the Speaker, who took the chair amid general applause.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, in whom is all wisdom, power, and goodness, bear with our infirmities, pardon our shortcomings, be gracious near to us, and guide our wandering footsteps into paths of purity and good will, that we may be profitable servants unto Thee and unto our fellow men, now and always, in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

ADDRESS OF HON. WILLIAM C. REDFIELD (H. DOC. NO. 758).

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD the address of the Hon. WILLIAM C. REDFIELD on the "Progress of Japanese Industry," delivered last fall before the Japanese conference at Clark University, at Worcester, Mass.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] asks unanimous consent to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech made by Mr. REDFIELD last fall before the Japanese conference at Worcester, Mass. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the question whether or not this goes into the subject of the admission of Japanese into the United States and allowing them to become citizens of the United States?

Mr. THAYER. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest to the gentlemen who ask unanimous consent at this time in the meeting of the House to print in the RECORD, that if they do so it be not in the ordinary course of proceedings, but in the part devoted to speeches held out of the RECORD. For instance, yesterday the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] inserted in the RECORD a speech, to which no one had any objection, but it interferes with those gentlemen who examine the RECORD daily to have such speeches come in the current proceedings of the House.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. RAKER. I will say to the gentleman that I think he is right, and I would have no objection to having that printed at the end of the proceedings, and I think this ought to be printed in that way.

Mr. THAYER. I have no objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman why it would not be better to have this printed as a House document? That would be in a form convenient for circulation. It is not in any sense a part of the proceedings of the House. That is the way outside speeches are printed in the Senate, and I would suggest the gentleman modify his request and ask that it be printed as a House document.

Mr. THAYER. I have no objection to that. I will amend my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] modifies his request and asks that the speech of Mr. REDFIELD be printed as a House document. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

EXTERMINATION OF RODENTS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, on March 12, 1912, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the Agriculture bill (H. R. 18960), and at that time I made a motion to amend the bill by putting on an amendment calling for an appropriation for the extermination of ground squirrels and rodents affected by the bubonic plague. The Senate has considered the bill. I now have a full statement from the department showing the necessity of such appropriation, written for the benefit of the House, and I ask that I have unanimous consent to print the statement from the Treasury Department in regard to the matter.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will print it in the same way.

Mr. RAKER. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER]?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
Washington, May 15, 1912.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with your request, there is forwarded herewith a memorandum prepared by the Surgeon General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, relative to the necessity for the destruction of ground squirrels on Federal public lands in California, to prevent the spread of bubonic plague.

Respectfully,

R. O. BAILEY,
Assistant Secretary.

MAY 13, 1912.

Memorandum relative to the necessity for the destruction of ground squirrels on Federal public lands in California.

The present outbreak of bubonic plague in California was discovered in 1907, and during that year the infection was also found among ground squirrels in rural districts. As a result of the cooperation between the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service and State and municipal health authorities the disease has been eradicated from cities in that State. The infection still prevails, however, among ground squirrels in rural districts.

The antiplague operations included the destruction of known foci of infection, the determination of the extent of the infection within the State, and general squirrel eradication. As a result of these efforts, there was established a squirrel-free zone around the cities of San Francisco, Oakland, Alameda, and Berkeley and vicinity, and the area of plague infection in counties of the State diminished. During the fiscal year 1911 plague infection was eradicated from 4 counties, leaving 7 counties infected out of a total of 45 counties in which antiplague operations have been conducted.

In the above operations the State and county authorities took an active part. In the fall and winter of 1910 the State board of health issued a circular letter to county boards of supervisors, calling their attention to a State law entitled "An act for the extermination of rodents," and requested their cooperation in the enforcement of the same. The medical officer representing the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service visited the counties interested and addressed the supervisors on the importance of controlling the infection, and offered Federal aid if the boards would join in a general movement for the eradication of ground squirrels.

The county boards of supervisors adopted resolutions urging property holders to immediately take measures to destroy all rodents found upon their premises, and requested the detail of experienced Federal inspectors to assist the board in exterminating rodents. Inspectors were appointed by the county for duty in connection with the enforcement of the law and Federal inspectors were assigned to supervise the work.

The farmers generally have taken a great interest in the work, devoting much time and money in squirrel poisoning and eradication. There is record of the destruction during the fiscal year of 126,125 ground squirrels, 124,265 having been examined in the Federal plague laboratory in San Francisco and 55 found to be plague infected. The total slaughter of ground squirrels was undoubtedly very much greater than the above figures indicate, but many of the animals could not be recovered for purposes of bacteriological examination, poisoning having been largely used for the purpose of destruction.

The act of the California Legislature dated March 13, 1909, and entitled "An act for the extermination of rodents," provides that all persons owning or controlling lands in which rodents are found shall proceed in good faith to exterminate them. Private property owners have been very active in this matter, but difficulties have arisen in connection with infested Federal lands. Private owners find that it is both a waste of time and money to attempt to exterminate squirrels on lands adjoining lands of national parks and forest reserves. These possessions of the National Government are alive with rodents. During certain seasons ground squirrels migrate in large numbers from them to the ranches and farms in the lower valley. In view of this fact, the farmers in certain localities have refused to undertake to attempt to eradicate rodents on their premises until some eradicative work has also been undertaken on unoccupied portions of the public domain in that vicinity.

In April, 1911, inspectors appointed by the supervisors of Tulare County reported that the larger portion of the public lands in California was infested with ground squirrels, and stated that the farmers and ranchers could not comply with the act above mentioned on account of the fact that the Government lands adjoining private lands served for breeding places for ground squirrels, and that squirrels migrated from public lands to the private lands adjoining. This was followed later by resolutions passed by county boards of supervisors, which reiterated the above statement and requested the cooperation of the Departments of the Interior and Agriculture in the extermination of rodents on lands under their respective jurisdictions. Upon the receipt of the information above outlined from the officer of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service in charge of antiplague measures in California, the Secretary of the Treasury addressed letters to the Secretaries of Agriculture and Interior, outlining the situation and requesting their cooperation to the extent of causing the destruction of squirrels on land under their control. Letters were received from the Secretaries of both departments which stated, in effect, that instructions would be sent to the officers in charge of forest reserves and national parks to cooperate in this work, so far as authority in law and appropriations would permit.

The facilities for such work by those departments have evidently been inadequate, and provision should be made to enable them to eradicate ground squirrels in the public domain coincident with the eradicative measures on private lands adjoining.

The occurrences and continuance of plague among ground squirrels in the rural districts of California is a distinct menace, not only to the urban districts of California, but to other States and Territories in the Union. While the disease can be controlled and eradicated from cities in California and elsewhere, constant danger of reinfection from infected rural districts exists. Commendable progress has been made in lessening the area of infection in counties of California. The work must be continued by all parties, and sufficient appropriations should be provided for the Federal Government to free its own lands from infection, and to aid State and municipal authorities in eradicating the infection from the State generally. The problem is not only local, but national, and what may appear to-day to be a local infection is likely to spread and become a menace to public health and interstate commerce.

REPRINT OF BILL.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print 25,000 more copies of the bill H. R. No. 1. I am just informed that the supply is entirely exhausted.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I have been unable to get any of these bills. I am informed they are all exhausted. Will not the gentleman modify his request and make the number of copies 50,000, so that some of us might get some of these bills to send out?

Mr. SHERWOOD. All right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] asks unanimous consent to have 50,000 copies of House bill No. 1 printed.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman certainly does not want the bill printed.

Mr. RUSSELL. He wants the law printed.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. SHERWOOD. I do.

Mr. RAKER. I have made an inquiry and I find that they are all exhausted in the document room.

Mr. MANN. And yet 30,000 copies have already been printed.

Mr. RAKER. Yes; but they are all exhausted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that 50,000 copies of the new pension law be printed.

Mr. MANN. Still reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. As I understand, the Pension Office is getting out an application blank, and I think when the age pension bill was passed before, the application blank was printed on one side and the law on the other side.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is so done now. I have seen the blanks. I have got some of the blanks.

Mr. MANN. Now, it seems to me that it is desirable to have the application blanks printed in connection with the law. If that can be done I shall not make objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. RUSSELL. The blanks are already printed or being printed.

Mr. MANN. Are they being printed in such numbers as the gentleman wants?

Mr. LANGLEY. I think they should be apportioned among the Members so that each Member may have his pro rata share.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know where these 30,000 copies that are spoken of have gone. I have not got any.

Mr. LANGLEY. Nor I.

Mr. MANN. Then you are not active. You could get them by going after them in time.

Mr. RAKER. I want to say to the gentleman that the first ones at the document room gets those.

Mr. LANGLEY. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that they be apportioned pro rata among the Members.

Mr. SHERWOOD. But a hundred Members do not want any.

Mr. LANGLEY. Then let them turn them over to those who do want them.

Mr. MANN. We can afford to print as many as are desired.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that 50,000 copies of the pension law founded upon bill No. 1 of the House be printed.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, I object, unless it is provided that they shall be distributed pro rata.

Mr. HAMLIN. And deposited in the folding room and distributed from there.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Yes; distributed pro rata through the folding room.

Mr. SHERWOOD. The difficulty about that is that a hundred Members do not want any.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. The people who want them should not be allowed to go and grab them up in the first instance and get them all, as they have done in the case of the 30,000 which were printed heretofore.

Mr. MANN. Let me suggest to the gentleman from New York that this is a very short law and very likely, on being sent out, the copies would not be sent out in large envelopes through the folding room as conveniently as through the Members in a small envelope under a frank. It is a great deal easier to send them out under a Member's frank in an envelope than under a frank slip through the folding room.

Mr. HAMLIN. But if they are in the folding room Members can send there and get them.

Mr. MANN. As soon as the application blank is available with the law printed on the back Members will not want the law by itself, but they will want the application blank with the law printed on the other side.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. They ought to be distributed through the folding room, so that we can all get our share of them.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Could not the gentleman make the request that 50,000 copies of this law be printed upon the back of the application that has already been approved by the Pension Bureau?

Mr. SHERWOOD. They have already been printed.

Mr. RAKER. If you print your 50,000 blanks and print the law on the back, you will not have to print the law separately. You save printing 50,000 copies of the law. You might just as well print the blanks and have the law on the back and have it all done at once.

Mr. LANGLEY. That will save our going to the Pension Office.

Mr. RAKER. It will save sending out two documents. It will be cheaper for the Government, more convenient for us, and handier for the pensioner to have the law right before him.

Mr. EDWARDS. What is the estimated cost per thousand of printing these laws?

Mr. SHERWOOD. We have no estimate.

Mr. LANGLEY. It is merely nominal.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I have been requested by at least 20 Members to have 50,000 copies printed, and these requests have been made in the last 24 hours. I have no estimates.

Mr. LANGLEY. It will cost only a few dollars.

Mr. SHERWOOD. It will cost only a very small amount.

Mr. EDWARDS. I understand the cost is nominal.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman modify his request about printing the law on one side and the blanks on the other?

Mr. SHERWOOD. If they have not been printed already.

Mr. RUSSELL. They have been printed, and the law is being printed on them now.

The SPEAKER. Is that the way it is being done now?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Why not go on in that way, then?

Mr. RUSSELL. They are printing them, anyhow; but I think there ought to be some copies of the law, besides. Some people want copies of the law who may not be entitled to the blanks. (Public, No. 155.)

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to print 50,000 copies of the pension law which was based on House bill No. 1. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO PRINT SPEECHES.

The SPEAKER. Until the Chair can communicate with the Committee on Printing the Chair will ask gentlemen who have leave to print speeches, or who get permission to have somebody else's speeches printed in the RECORD, to act on the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], which is eminently proper, and mark the speeches as they go to the Printing Office, "Print this at the end of the proceedings." The gentleman from Illinois is right in the suggestion that to print the speeches in the body of the proceedings has a tendency to confusion. Members do not want to read these speeches when they are hunting for something in particular.

FRIAR LANDS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

This being Calendar Wednesday, the Speaker laid before the House the unfinished business coming over from last Wednesday, being the bill (H. R. 17756) to amend an act approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask what is the parliamentary status of the two amendments which were offered, or rather which were read to be offered. If those amendments are pending, I would like to be heard in opposition to them. I understand that one of them is to be withdrawn, if it is considered as pending, but I wish to know whether they are before the House or have simply been read for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] is pending. The amendment or substitute of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] was simply read for information as a part of his remarks, with the statement that he intended to offer it, but the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] has notified the Chair that he is going to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the Chair and to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] that I think I shall withdraw my substitute, owing to the fact that it goes to the public-land section of the organic law as well as the friar lands; but I want to say now to the gentleman from Virginia that it is my intention to make a motion to recommit the bill with instructions to strike out the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] which was incorporated in it on last Wednesday. I shall do that, if I get recognition, in lieu of offering the substitute which I had read last Wednesday.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, upon an examination of the RECORD I am somewhat in doubt as to just what the amendment is that the Chair stated to be pending. I thought perhaps the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] might desire to change or modify it in some respects.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman rising to a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. JONES. I suppose it is in the nature of a parliamentary inquiry. The RECORD states, on page 6411, that the Clerk read the amendment in these words:

> Amend, page 2, line 21, by inserting, after the word "holdings," the following:
> "And provided further, That every citizen of the United States shall be permitted to purchase land from the Philippine Government subject to the limitations and restrictions herein provided."

And that the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] rose and said:

> The gentleman might say, "This act as amended." Would that help it?
> Mr. OLMSTED. I have no objection to that. I have no objection to changing it so that it will read: "This act as hereby amended."
> The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the change will be made.
> There was no objection.

Now, as amended by adding the words "this act as hereby amended," the last line of the amendment would read:

> Subject to the limitations and restrictions herein provided this act as hereby amended.

The amendment as thus amended is absolutely meaningless.

Mr. OLMSTED. If the gentleman from Virginia will permit, the amendment as actually offered by me appears on page 6076. It is true, however, referring back to page 6072, that I had agreed to modify it somewhat at the suggestion of certain gentlemen, and now if there be no objection, I will modify the amendment as printed on page 6076 by striking out the words "herein provided" and add in lieu thereof the words "in this act as hereby amended."

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to make that modification, I shall have to object.

Mr. OLMSTED. I am quite content with the amendment as it is.

Mr. JONES. My reason for offering the objection is this——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not have to give any reason for his objection.

Mr. OLMSTED. I will withdraw the request, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. I sent an amendment to the Clerk's desk during the consideration of this bill and supposed that it was pending, and I would like to ask whether or not the amendment is pending?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment now and have it pending.

Mr. OLMSTED. I have no objection to the gentleman offering an amendment, but I would like to have mine disposed of first.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Wisconsin will have the right to offer an amendment after the other amendment is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Of course, and the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I desire to have the Speaker refer to my substitute, found on page 6083 of the RECORD, and state the parliamentary status of that substitute. There has been some question raised as to whether the substitute is actually pending.

The SPEAKER. The Journal Clerk informs the Chair that the Journal shows that that amendment is pending and that a point of order was reserved against it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That is my judgment of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will so hold if the Journal shows it. The RECORD also shows the fact.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment offered by me be again reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 21, after the word "holdings," insert the following: "And provided further, That every citizen of the United States shall be permitted to purchase lands from the Philippine Government, subject to the limitations and restrictions herein provided."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to the fact that the Clerk has not read all of the amendment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania accepted as an addition to that amendment these words, "In this act as hereby amended," and the Speaker declared that inasmuch as there was no objection the change would be made. That is found on page 6072. I desire that the amendment as it is now before the House shall be read.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I asked, as is found on page 6072 of the RECORD, to have the amendment read for information. I did not offer it at all, but I did agree that I would be willing to accept the change suggested; but when I offered the amendment I offered it as it now appears on page 6076 and in the exact form in which it there appears.

The SPEAKER. What is the point that the gentleman from Virginia makes?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, the point I make is this, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] offered an amendment in the precise language as read by the Clerk. The RECORD is very clear upon the subject. A suggestion was made that that amendment should be amended. The Chair will find on page 6072 of the RECORD what took place, and the amendment as modified by the suggestion of the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. Where is the gentleman reading?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I am reading from the last column on page 6072 of the RECORD of May 8, 1912. I will read what took place:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RUCKER in the chair). The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Page 2, line 21, after the word 'holdings,' insert:

"'And provided further, That in the sale of lands by the Philippine Government there shall be no restriction, limitation, or discrimination against any citizen of the United States.'"

Mr. OLMSTED. Without objection, I would change that amendment to an amendment in the form of the one which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Amend, page 2, line 21, by inserting after the word 'holdings' the following:

"'And provided further, That every citizen of the United States shall be permitted to purchase land from the Philippine Government subject to the limitations and restrictions herein provided.'"

Mr. JONES. I understand what the object is, but your amendment says that any citizen of the United States shall be permitted to buy any of the public lands of the Philippine Islands, and that would include the so-called public lands subject to the limitations and restrictions of this act.

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes.

Mr. JONES. It occurred to me that it possibly might mean subject to the restrictions and limitations of this bill, but you refer to the act which this bill would amend?

Mr. OLMSTED. Surely. And the act as it would be amended by this bill.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman might say, "This act as amended." Would that help it?

Mr. OLMSTED. I have no objection to that. I have no objection to changing it so that it will read: "This act as hereby amended."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the change will be made.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest that a simple way out of this snarl is for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] to withdraw his amendment, which he has an absolute right to do, and then to offer the amendment in the shape he wants it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it seems to me the simplest way would be for him to offer a substitute for his own amendment.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I was just preparing a substitute, which I desire to offer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers a substitute for the pending amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute: Page 2, line 21, after the word "holdings," insert the words:

"And provided further, That any citizen of the United States shall be permitted to purchase lands from the Philippine Government, subject to the limitations of this act, as hereby amended."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the substitute is not germane to the bill before the House.

Mr. OLMSTED. I supposed that was the point which the gentleman was trying to make. Mr. Speaker, the amendment I did offer was made without any point of order being made against it, and this being a substitute, the substitute is germane to the amendment and therefore is in order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order of the gentleman from Virginia is overruled.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard for a moment on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in the first place that when this amendment was offered it was my understanding, and I think it was the understanding of the House, that it was simply read for the information of the House, as was the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN]. If that had not been my impression at that time, I would most assuredly have made the point of order that the amendment was not germane. It was because I regarded the amendment as simply read for the information of the House and that it was not before the House that I did not make the point of order.

In support of my contention, I wish to say that if this amendment had been before this House for its action the only business which the House could have transacted would have been its disposition. No effort was made to dispose of the amendment at all. The Chair recognized different gentlemen, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] among others, the Chair stating specifically that he recognized the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] to speak upon the merits of the bill, and not upon the amendment. Mr. Speaker, under these circumstances I did not at that time make the point that this amendment was not germane.

Another point, Mr. Speaker, to which I desire to call attention is this. If I understand the rules of the House, amendments are not in order in the House until bills are read a second time.

This bill, as I understand it, has not been read a second time for amendment, and therefore——

The SPEAKER. The rule of the House is this: That under the situation that this bill is in a Member can offer an amendment to any part of it at any time that he can get recognition from the Chair, and the House can either vote on the amendment then or take time to discuss it. When the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] arose to address the Chair, the Chair does not remember whether he asked to make a speech on the bill or on the amendment; but it does not make a particle of difference.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, let me call the attention of the Chair to what the Chair did do at that time. On page 6076, middle of the page, first column, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] said:

Mr. Speaker, I now offer again and desire to be heard on the amendment which was read some time ago and which is considered pending.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Then the Clerk read the amendment. At the bottom of the page the gentleman from Pennsylvania took the floor, and my colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] made the point of order that the gentleman from Pennsylvania was not entitled to the floor. The Speaker decided:

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] has offered an amendment, and he has the right to an hour on the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman let me ask him this question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman read until he reached the amendment, but he did not read the amendment. Now, I want to ask him to read the amendment and to say whether or not it is the amendment which was before the House. I submit it is not the amendment which was before the House; that it is another amendment.

Mr. MANN. That may be, but that is pending and has not been disposed of.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman's amendment which you have before you is not the amendment——

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, whether it is correctly printed in the RECORD or not does not matter.

Mr. JONES. It is not a question of whether it is correctly printed in the RECORD, but it is not the amendment at all.

Mr. MANN. An amendment was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and he was recognized by the Speaker for an hour on that amendment. Now, whether the amendment is correctly printed in the RECORD or not does not make any difference. The Clerk at the desk has the amendment and the amendment has not been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The parliamentary situation is that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] did not raise any point of order against it. Nobody else raised a point of order. Now it is too late, in the opinion of the Chair, unless the gentleman from Virginia wants to be heard still further, to raise the point of order against this substitute, because it has been decided time and time again that if a proposition, which would have been subject to a point of order as not germane, is left in a bill or left pending without any point of order being made against it, it is subject to any amendment germane to the proposition itself even though such amendment to the amendment would not have been germane to the bill itself or to any part thereof. Of course the same rule applies to a substitute.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it. The point of order of the gentleman from Virginia is overruled.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, in order to make the ruling of the Speaker perfectly clear, and particularly with reference to its effect on other pending amendments, I shall ask a question and ask the Chair to consider for a moment before answering the question in order to make a brief statement. I want to ask whether the Chair permitted the gentleman from Pennsylvania to offer his substitute as germane to the pending bill or as a substitute to the pending amendment to which the point of order was not raised? Now, in explanation of that question I will say to the Chair that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in the inconsistent position of having raised the point of order against my substitute upon the ground it was not germane to the pending bill.

Mr. MANN. He did not offer it——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. And yet the gentleman offers a substitute which goes to identically the same subject matter; that is to say, to the public lands, so called, in the Philippine Islands. Section 15 of the organic law of the Philippine Islands related only to the public domain acquired from Spain. Section 65 relates to the friar lands. The gentleman has offered a substitute for his amendment which is not confined merely to the friar lands, but goes as well to the public domain, authorizing citizens of the United States to acquire not only friar lands, but public lands. Now, my substitute goes to the same lands, but instead of authorizing their acquisition, as his does, my substitute forbids their acquisition, so the principle involved would be identically the same. Now, it was for that reason I asked the Chair the question, whether he is permitting the substitute of the gentleman on the ground that it is germane to the bill or on the ground that it is germane to a nongermane amendment against which the point of order was not raised at the time.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair permits it at all, he is permitting it on the latter ground stated by the gentleman—that the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] was permitted to get into the position of advantage by nobody raising the point. The Chair is not deciding, and he is not required to decide, and he is not going to decide, under the circumstances, whether or not a point of order would have been good against the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, because the proceedings have passed that stage.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. So, then, the point of order raised against my substitute is not necessarily determined by the ruling of the Chair upon the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I say the point of order raised against my substitute is not necessarily determined by the ruling of the Chair on the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED]?

Mr. MANN. You never offered a substitute.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The Chair has decided that the Journal and RECORD show that my substitute is pending. I do not know whether I make myself clear to the Chair, although it is clear to me. The Chair has permitted the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] to offer his substitute for the amendment which he already had pending, against which the point of order could have been but was not raised.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has simply ruled——

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Now, I want to know whether that goes to the point of order raised against my substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair simply decided that the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania for his own amendment could not be ruled out at this stage of the proceedings by the point of order made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] that the substitute is not germane to the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I understand that.

The SPEAKER. That is all the Chair decided. If the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] has any other point of order to make, the Chair will hear that.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I understand now that the fate of my substitute is still undetermined?

Mr. JONES. That is unquestionably true, Mr. Speaker, unless the gentleman has withdrawn it. The Chair has not passed on it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Colorado a question, in order to get this matter straightened out. Was the substitute of the gentleman from Colorado simply a substitute for a particular section or was it offered as a substitute for the entire bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It was offered as a substitute for the entire bill.

The SPEAKER. And the point of order was reserved?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes, sir. The point of order was that my substitute was not germane to the subject matter of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the House passing on that substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania for his own amendment in no way affects the status of the substitute of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] for the whole bill.

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes, sir.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That is what I wanted to make clear. This is the situation it raises, namely, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] offered a nongermane amendment——

The SPEAKER. Yes; and the House slept on its rights and let it become a matter to be considered. The amendment he now offers is germane to his amendment which he offered without any point of order being made against it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard on the merits of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] is entitled to the floor if he wants it.

Mr. JONES. I may say to the Chair that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] discussed this amendment for an hour and then yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania discussed his original amendment for an hour and then sat down without making any motion whatever about this bill, and therefore it swung back to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES]. But it is a new amendment to the amendment. It is his proposition, and he has a right to be heard on it first if he desires to be heard.

Mr. OLMSTED. Upon which, Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard very briefly.

The amendment which I originally offered, or rather had read for information, as printed on page 6411, was perfectly plain to me, but the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] and some other gentleman thought it possible that it would not carry with it the restrictions in the act of 1902 as amended by this bill. So, to meet their desire, I proposed to change it so that instead of saying "as herein provided," it shall read, "the limitations and restrictions of this act as hereby amended," thus complying with their request; but when the amendment was finally offered, on page 6416 in the RECORD, it was read in its original form, and when this morning I asked unanimous consent to change it, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] objected for the purpose of raising a fine point, which did not prevail.

Now, the total object of this amendment which I have just offered—this substitute—is to comply with their request and to make it perfectly plain that if any citizen of the United States buys land under this authority, he buys it subject to all the restrictions of the act of 1902, as amended by the pending bill.

The object of the amendment is that citizens of the United States shall not be excluded, if they want to buy 40 acres of land in the Philippines. It seems to me that no man can stand up and with any reason oppose such an amendment as that. I think it is the law now, but the gentleman from Virginia and some other gentlemen think that no citizen of the United States can buy land in the Philippines. If so, it is an outrageous position—an outrageous position for us to be placed in—and that situation ought to be changed; the sole object of this amendment is to change it. We are limiting here the amount to be purchased to 40 acres. What reason can any man give why a citizen of the United States can not buy 40 acres of land, if he has the money to pay for it, anywhere under the flag?

That is all I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, and I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], if he desires to take it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not desire to speak on the amendment, but I desire to speak on the bill.

Mr. OLMSTED. Then, Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] is recognized.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, in order that the House may clearly understand just what this amendment seeks to accomplish, I wish to state that the bill before the House simply proposes to amend section 65 of the organic act of the Philippine Islands. Section 65 does not contain a single word relating to the character of the persons who can acquire public lands or friar lands from the Philippine Government.

This amendment, to which a substitute is offered, would have been ruled out by the Chair without any question had the point been made that it was not germane to the matter embraced in this bill, and it is the consciousness of that fact which prevented the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] from withdrawing it and offering the amendment which is embodied in the substitute. The substitute is, in other words, merely a subterfuge for the purpose of getting before this House a proposition that is in no sense connected with or germane to the matter embraced in the bill before the House.

The fifteenth section of the organic act provides that the public lands of the Philippine Islands can only be sold—mark the words—"to actual occupants, settlers, and other citizens of the Philippine Islands." The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] admits, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said on Wednesday last in offering this amendment, that the law now is that these lands can not be sold to others than actual occupants, settlers, and other citizens of the Philippine Islands; and therefore the object of the gentleman is not to change the law, or any line of the law, embraced in section 65, but to amend section 15 of the organic act, which prohibits the sale of any public lands to citizens of the United States.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that he desires merely to make plain the language of section 15; that he thinks it is already plain, but that I do not take the same view of it that he does, and therefore he wants to make it plain.

Mr. Speaker, the language of this law is so plain that, in my judgment, no intelligent man who wants to construe it fairly and honestly can possibly be mistaken as to its meaning. It says that the public lands can only be sold to actual occupants, settlers, and other citizens of the islands. To show that this language was not inadvertently used, to make it perfectly plain that the committee, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] was a member when the organic law was before this House, as well as the Senate committee having the bill in charge, and the conferees on the bill understood perfectly the meaning of this language, I call attention to the fact that there is another section of this law which relates to mineral and coal lands. That section provides that mineral and coal lands may be purchased by citizens of the Philippines and by citizens of the United States; but no citizen of any foreign country can buy an acre of mineral or coal lands in the Philippine Islands. It was the purpose of the Committee on Insular Affairs, it was the purpose of Congress in enacting this law, that the agricultural lands should be held exclusively for occupancy by Filipinos; but when the committee came to deal with the mineral and coal lands it did not propose to exclude citizens of the United States, and so the law provides that citizens of the United States, as well as citizens of the Philippine Islands, may purchase the mineral and coal lands.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], if adopted, Filipino citizens taking these lands will have to be occupants in order to buy, but that American citizens could buy without regard to occupancy?

Mr. JONES. I suppose that to be the meaning and intent of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. However, the gentleman who offered it has not informed me as to what he believes will be its effect.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I recall the amendment that was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] and adopted by the House a week ago, under which, it seems to me, the subject of the sale of lands in the Philippine Islands will be largely regulated by the Philippine Legislature hereafter. Am I right in that?

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is right as to the 125,000 acres of friar lands; but, if the gentleman will pardon me, this amendment undertakes not to amend the bill which is pending before the House, but an entirely different section of the organic law; it undertakes to amend the fifteenth section and to permit any citizen of the United States to buy any of the public agricultural lands.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] seems to think that it is most remarkable that I should want to prevent citizens of the United States from purchasing the agricultural public lands of the Philippine Islands. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact—and I have refreshed my memory by reading every word that took place when these sections were before the House 10 years ago—that those who participated in the debate which then took place laid particular stress upon the fact the friar lands were purchased in order to provide homesteads for Filipinos, and that the purpose in limiting the disposition of the public lands was to effectually prevent their ownership and exploitation by aliens. At that time I offered an amendment to section 16 of the bill which, if adopted, would have prevented corporations from acquiring an acre of the friar lands and would have limited individuals to the acquisition of not more than 160 acres. Both the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] voted against my amendment.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. MANN. Under the existing law if a citizen of the United States goes to the Philippine Islands in any capacity and desires to remain there and cultivate the soil, can he acquire any portion of these lands by purchase?

Mr. JONES. A citizen of the United States?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Under the law as it now stands I do not believe he legally can, but I will say to the gentleman that the Philippine Commission, or rather the interior department of the Philippine Islands, under which these lands are administered, has never paid the slightest regard to the language under discussion. No discrimination has ever been made against citizens of the United States in the sale of public lands in the Philippines.

Mr. MANN. Not merely the friar lands?

Mr. JONES. I am speaking of the public lands.

Mr. MANN. Have citizens of the United States been able to acquire land in 40-acre tracts?

Mr. JONES. I think so. I know citizens of the United States have bought friar lands, and I am quite certain that they have acquired parts of the public lands. But this I know to be the case, that the Philippine authorities have held that they had a right to sell either the public lands or the friar lands to any citizen of the United States, and that the language which I have read did not preclude their doing so. There has been no investigation as to this particular subject. The congressional investigation which took place in the last Congress related solely to the disposition of friar lands in large quantities.

Mr. MANN. That was a question in reference to friar lands.

Mr. JONES. There is nothing before the House relating to the public lands.

Mr. MANN. There is now.

Mr. JONES. Yes; there is since the gentleman from Illinois suggested to the gentleman from Pennsylvania a method by which he might get it before the House.

Mr. MANN. I always give parliamentary advice to my side of the House.

Mr. JONES. The proposition embodied in the amendment, however, is not germane to the bill which the House is considering. It got before the House by a parliamentary device.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] says that my contention is that citizens of the United States can not purchase public lands in the Philippines. He is correct in this statement, but he also knows that every member of the minority of the Committee on Insular Affairs of the Sixty-first Congress, with possibly two exceptions, took exactly the same ground that I now take. He also knows that three members of the majority, namely, Messrs. Madison, of Kansas, HUBBARD, of Iowa, and DAVIS, of Minnesota, took precisely the same position.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to make a partial answer to the question of the gentleman from Illinois with reference to the sale of public lands other than those of the Philippine Islands. On page 204 of the hearings is a list of sales of public lands to others than citizens of the Philippine Islands; and I will say that they were not only citizens of the United States, but they were officials of the Philippine Government and were officials in the land department of the Philippine Government. On page 205 is a long list of leases of public lands, leased for a period of 50 years at the minimum rental allowed by law to citizens of the United States and to corporations organized by citizens of the United States, and that the majority of the officials were citizens of the Philippine Islands, including officials in the land department, the assistant director of public lands, and that these corporations were organized to develop and lease these public lands.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Colorado for having furnished the specific information asked for by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I was quite sure that citizens of the United States had actually purchased public lands, but my memory was not sufficiently clear to enable me to make the positive statement.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, do I understand the gentleman from Virginia to say that the Philippine Commission has interpreted section 15 of the organic act as not preventing a sale of parts of the public domain to people other than citizens of the Philippine Islands?

Mr. JONES. I am saying that identical thing.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Then, if the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] should be adopted, it would practically be a legislative indorsement of that interpretation.

Mr. JONES. That is precisely what it will be, and that, in my humble judgment, is the object which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has in view. The gentleman says that he does not agree with me, but his action in pressing this amendment shows to my mind that he thinks there is a good deal more in my contention than he is willing to admit; and the object of this substitute is not only to confirm every illegal act of the Secretary of the Interior and the director of public lands in the Philippine Islands, so far as they relate to sales of lands to citizens of the United States, but it will, if adopted, permit the sale of every acre of the public lands in the Philippines, which are the God-given inheritance of the Philippine people, to citizens of the United States.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Then I do not understand how the gentleman connects the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] with the other section of the bill. It specifically refers to this section 65, which is the friar-land section.

Mr. JONES. Yes; but it relates to all Government-owned lands. Had it been confined in terms to the friar lands there would have been no question as to its being germane.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. I understand that part of it. It seems to me that what he is seeking to amend is section 65.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] will be frank enough to tell the gentleman that he is seeking by his amendment to repeal the language of section 15, which confines the sales of public lands to actual occupants, settlers, and other citizens of the Philippines. Has the gentleman the amendment before him?

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. I have not.

Mr. JONES. Then I shall read it to the gentleman. The amendment says, following the last word in the bill:

And provided further, That any citizen of the United States shall be permitted to purchase lands from the Philippine Government subject to the limitations and restrictions herein provided.

It will be seen that the language is "lands," not "friar lands."

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Of course the limitations herein provided are 40 acres.

Mr. JONES. That is the construction which I have always placed upon the present law, and I think the gentleman agrees with me.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Then under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania no American citizen would be permitted to purchase more than 40 acres of any land.

Mr. JONES. This may be true as to the public lands.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Then where is the danger in it if that is true? If no American citizen can purchase more than 40 acres, what is the danger?

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is discussing the merits of the proposition. In the first place, I do not believe that we ought to change existing law in the Philippine Islands in this way. This bill was introduced for the purpose of construing one section of the law, and I do not think an attempt ought to be made, even if it can be done under the rules, to change one of the most important provisions of another and a different section which is not before the House except in so far as this amendment brings it before it. This provision of the organic law, or, rather, the whole act, was under consideration for five or six days.

Mr. COOPER. It was considered for one week.

Mr. JONES. And these sections were discussed at great length.

They were also discussed in the Senate at great length, and the conference committee had charge of the bill for a number of days, and it made a great many important changes in the law. It can not, therefore, be contended that the language which confines the sale of public lands to citizens of the Philippines was placed in the law without due consideration. Its meaning is certainly too clear and obvious to permit of any discussion. If this were not true, we would not now be considering this amendment.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether in the discussion of the organic act in 1902, at the time of its passage, there was any discussion of the proposition that citizens of the United States should not acquire land in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. JONES. Not one word was said on the subject. The language was so plain that nobody asked its meaning. There was no mistaking that the purpose was to confine the sale of agricultural lands to citizens of the Philippine Islands, but to permit citizens of the United States to purchase mineral and coal lands if they desired to do so.

Mr. OLMSTED. One more question. Is the gentleman opposed to allowing a citizen of the United States to buy 40 acres of land in the Philippines?

Mr. JONES. I am opposed to it. I think the policy of prohibiting the sale of the agricultural lands of the Philippines to aliens is a wise one. But if we permitted aliens to purchase 40 acres they might, and doubtless would, through the agency of dummies, secure a great deal more.

Mr. OLMSTED. The act prohibits that for five years.

Mr. JONES. For a certain length of time it does, but after the expiration of that period the lands can be alienated.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Right at that point, will the gentleman then not accept the amendment which I offer and which will prevent that very thing?

Mr. JONES. I will say to my friend that if I believed his amendment was constitutional, and if I believed it was wise to adopt so radical a policy as he proposes, I would not oppose it. I am as much opposed as is the gentleman to the exploitation of the Philippines, but I can not believe that we ought to undertake to limit the quantity of land which one individual may acquire from another individual. I am not willing to force a policy of this kind upon the Filipinos when I would oppose the same thing if attempted in the United States. The Government can and should dispose of the public lands in small bodies, but it would be very unwise to say that no citizen shall own more than a limited quantity of land. That would discourage thrift and enterprise.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON]?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. JACKSON. If the gentleman is correct in his view that the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will ratify and confirm all the sales made to citizens of the United States, does not he also think that the gentleman's bill will ratify the sale of the San Jose estate?

Mr. JONES. No; that does not follow at all.

Mr. JACKSON. Where is the difference?

Mr. JONES. The bill before the House simply says that hereafter there shall be no sales of friar lands in excess of the limitations fixed in section 15. That is all. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] would like to see an amendment adopted which would declare all sales made in excess of the limitations fixed in section 15 adopted, but he will not press that amendment simply because he knows it is not germane to this bill.

It is thoroughly understood that unless this bill passes the remainder of the friar lands will be disposed of without limitation as to quantity. The Secretary of War and even the President have given us so to understand. Hence the urgent necessity for the passage of this bill.

Mr. JACKSON. If the gentleman will permit, just a moment. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman in his statement, but it does seem to me, according to what the gentleman has said, that the substitute of the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado should be adopted.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Colorado is going to withdraw his amendment. There are a great many changes that I would like to see made in the organic law, but that is no reason why this change should not be made now. We can not accomplish everything at once. This bill was only designed to accomplish one thing, and gentlemen who favor it should not insist that it does not cover many other provisions of the organic law that they would like to see changed. There are a great many reforms which I would like to see adopted. The Committee on Insular Affairs has reported a bill which is now on the calendar which makes very radical changes in the government of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. JACKSON. Why not report that bill?

Mr. JONES. That has been reported, and it would have been called up on last Wednesday if the gentleman had not united with others who engaged in a filibuster to prevent its consideration.

Mr. JACKSON. I think the gentleman is mistaken about anybody filibustering.

Mr. JONES. I am not, because the gentleman who led the filibuster frankly admitted his purpose to me. Had I agreed not to call up the Philippine independence bill, much of the opposition to this bill would have disappeared.

Mr. JACKSON. That would not make this bill any better, would it?

Mr. JONES. Those who oppose this bill, as well as those who advocate it, agree that Congress ought by affirmative action declare its policy as to the disposition of the friar lands. However much we differ as to what that policy should be, we all agree that the intention of Congress should be made clear and definite, and that is all this bill seeks to accomplish.

Mr. JACKSON. It must be plain to the gentleman, from what he has already said to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], that if we now pass an act which, as the gentleman says, is meant to interpret the act which has already been passed, that we greatly injure every chance the Philippine Government has to recover this San Jose estate.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. He is too good a lawyer to hold that if we put a stop to the sales of friar lands in large quantities in the future we thereby in some way make it more difficult to have those which have illegally been made declared void. I can not appreciate the force of an argument such as this.

Mr. JACKSON. Why not write something in your bill to right the wrong.

Mr. JONES. This bill does not undertake, as I have already said, to right all the wrongs that have been committed in the Philippine Islands. The wrongs of which the gentleman complains will, in my judgment, have to be righted in the courts. But however this may be, I for one am anxious to pass this bill and thus put a stop to the sales of these lands.

Mr. OLMSTED. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] has stated that there are reports of Mr. DAVIS and Mr. Madison covering his opposition in this matter. I wish to read three lines from that report:

> We believe that the amount that can be secured as a homestead should be increased to 160 acres, and that citizens of the United States not in the Philippine service should be qualified entrymen.

Mr. JONES. Does that change my statement? I did not say that Judge Madison thought the limit should not be increased. I said that he declared that the law as it stands to-day forbids the sale of public lands to citizens of the United States. If the gentleman has the Madison report before him he knows what I say is absolutely correct.

Mr. COOPER rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]?

Mr. JONES. I will, but I want to reserve most of my time.

Mr. COOPER. I want to say a word right there in the way of an interruption.

Mr. JONES. Will not the gentleman speak in his own time?

Mr. COOPER. I was going to ask this question first: When Judge Madison said that the homestead area in the Philippine Islands ought to be increased to 100 acres, do you not think that he had forgotten that the testimony of Gov. Taft and of all the other witnesses was, and is, that 1 acre of that friar land is worth from 3 to 4 acres of land here? The homestead area of 100 acres would be the equivalent of 400 acres in this country. I am opposed to that, and so everybody else should be.

Mr. JONES. I will say that Judge Madison was not a member of this committee and not a Member of Congress when the organic law was considered. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is perfectly correct when he says that the then governor of the Philippines stated that the Filipino could raise as much on 40 acres of his land as an American could raise on a homestead of 160 acres in the United States.

As I have endeavored to make plain, this amendment does not seek to change anything in section 65. It is an attempt to change the policy of Congress as set forth in section 15, which policy was and is that aliens shall not purchase the agricultural public lands in the Philippines. Speaking from the standpoint of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], I can see no pressing necessity for the adoption of his amendment. The Philippine Commission places exactly the construction he does on section 15, and they are selling the public lands to citizens of the United States straight along, and nobody is attempting to stop them. My construction of the law need not, therefore, disturb the gentleman.

There is still another objection which I have to this amendment. It makes it obligatory upon the Philippine Government to sell the public lands to any American who may desire them. No matter how undesirable a citizen he may be his application can not be refused. He may have spent the greater part of his life in prison for land frauds, and yet no application he may make can be refused. The amendment would have accomplished the purpose of the gentleman much better, I take it, if it said that in the sale of the public lands no discrimination should be made against American citizens.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used 40 minutes.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT, by unanimous consent, by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the bill (H. R. 24565) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report (No. 710), was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. All points of order are reserved.

FRIAR LANDS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Speaker, it is with great diffidence that I partake in the debate of the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

The United States acquired the public lands of the Philippines by treaty of peace with Spain, concluded in December, 1898. In the act of Congress entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the administration of civil affairs in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," it was provided in section 12:

That all the property and rights which may have been acquired in the Philippine Islands by the United States under the treaty of peace with Spain, signed December 10, 1898, except such lands or other property as shall be designated by the President of the United States for military and other reservations of the Government of the United States, are hereby placed under the control of the Government of said Islands, to be administered for the benefit of the inhabitants thereof, except as provided in this act.

Thus the public lands of the Philippines were turned over to the Philippine Government to be administered for the benefit of the Filipino people.

By the provisions of section 15 of the same act the grant or sale and conveyance of these public lands by the Philippine Government is restricted to actual occupants and settlers and other citizens of the Philippine Islands, so that, no foreigner, nor even an American citizen, residing therein, is permitted to acquire any part or portion of said public lands. The object of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as he stated it, is that citizens of the United States shall not be excluded if they want public lands in the Philippine Islands subject to all the restrictions of the organic act.

Obviously, I am placed in a most delicate position. I can not, in discussing this matter, ask the Government of the United States not to give any portion of these lands to its own citizens. But I can make, and I feel justified in making certain points, leaving to the House the drawing of its own conclusions therefrom.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I wish to take exception to the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it would be an "outrageous" position for Congress to prohibit citizens of the United States to acquire public lands in the Philippines. I must say that I can not agree with the gentleman.

I believe that such a word as "outrageous" is hardly proper to qualify any action of Congress—the Congress of the United States—a body composed of the Representatives of 90,000,000 people, who are in the lead of progress and civilization; and least of all in this case, in which Congress for what it did, merited the respect and admiration of mankind, because in keeping the public lands of the Philippine Islands from its own citizens and reserving them only for the benefit of the Filipino people it has executed a generous action never surpassed in the history of any parliament in the world. [Applause.]

When I called the attention of the Insular Committee last year to the fact that the Philippine Government was permitting the acquisition of public lands in the Philippine Islands by citizens of the United States, which, I contended, was prohibited by the organic act, the secretary of the interior department of the Philippines, Mr. Worcester, took issue with me on the subject, and made the following suggestion, which reveals his trend of mind on Philippine affairs: "It would be rather remarkable, Señor QUEZON, if a sovereign country would refuse to sell its own lands to its own people. That would be an anomaly, would it not?" I answered, "Not at all. It is altruism on the part of the sovereign country to keep the lands of the acquired territory for the people thereof, and the refusal to sell the lands to the citizens of the sovereign Nation indicates that there is no intention of permanently annexing the acquired territory."

Why, Mr. Speaker, that which Secretary Worcester calls an "anomaly" is the proof that the United States is but temporarily in the Philippines, and that it has acquired the islands, not to exploit them, but for the purpose of helping the Filipino people, and of guarding their interests. [Applause.]

A few days ago the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] in the course of his remarks on this bill said that the provision of the organic act creating the Philippine Assembly, which was so bitterly fought on the floor of this House, is the very provision that helped this Government to accomplish whatever success it had in the Philippine Islands. The gentleman might have added that the provision of the organic act which excludes everybody from acquiring public lands, except Philippine citizens, is the one provision that told the Filipinos, in deeds, not in words, that the policy of this Government in the Philippine Islands is a policy of self-denial and altruism, or, as it has been officially termed, the policy of "the Philippines for the Filipinos." [Applause.]

The adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would, of course, mean the reversing of this policy.

Now, the first point that I wish to make is this: Is Congress ready to depart from its policy—the Philippines for the Filipinos—adopted in 1902; has anything taken place since the passage of the organic act that warrants a diametrically opposite course in dealing with the islands; has Congress already decided that the Philippine public lands are not to be kept for the exclusive benefit of the Filipino people, but also for the benefit of citizens of the United States; what is the event, if any, that calls for a revolution in the humanitarian, just, and wise policy so far pursued by Congress with regard to the Philippines?

Let us consider the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania from the standpoint of its practical results. Personally I have no objection to allowing any American citizen to acquire 40 acres of land in the Philippine Islands. I would say more than that. I would say that I shall be glad to have any citizen of the United States, residing in the Philippine Islands, acquire 40 acres of land for his farm, because every American living in the Philippines who acquires 40 acres of land, and farms it, will no longer be a citizen of the United States, but he will become a citizen of the Philippine Islands. [Applause.] He may not be legally a citizen of the Philippine Islands, for no one except a native Filipino can acquire that citizenship according to our present laws, but he surely will be, for all practical purposes, a Filipino. Ah, Mr. Speaker, the man who is firmly rooted in the soil of a country, through the ownership of a piece of land, which he works himself, that man becomes a real citizen of that country, all laws to the contrary notwithstanding. He becomes as thorough a patriot as any native-born inhabitant; and every American who wishes to be our brother, who wants to be a Filipino and to link his fate with that of our little but dear country is cordially welcome.

But, will the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania have this desirable result at all? Will any American care to acquire 40 acres of public land in the Philippines for his home and his farm? I do not think so. In fact, though the Philippine Government, transgressing its constitutional limitations, has already legislated that American citizens may acquire homesteads in the Philippines, I know of not a single instance wherein an American has taken advantage of this privilege, and the explanation of this is obvious. The Philippines, as a tropical country, are not particularly adapted to be the permanent home of an American, and no one, for the mere sake of acquiring 40 acres of land, when he can obtain 160 acres for homestead in this, his own country, will care to undergo the hardships imposed by the Tropics upon the white people. Citizens of the United States resident in the Philippines are but temporary residents there. They do not hope to live and die in the islands. The whole American population is composed of two classes—employees and business men. The former have no time to farm 40 acres of land, and if they had, they should not be allowed to acquire Government land. The latter do not care to farm 40 acres of land.

What good, then, will this amendment do for the Americans in the Philippines?

I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that if this amendment should pass it will not procure for the Philippines bona fide American settlers, but it will only be taken advantage of for the purpose of defeating the will of Congress to prevent the exploitation of large tracts of land in the islands by absentee landlords. [Applause.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes, sir.

Mr. OLMSTED. In the law relating to Philippine lands there is this provision, after providing for sales of 16 hectares and not more—that the grant and sale of such land, whether the purchase price be paid at once or in partial payments, shall be conditioned upon actual and continued occupancy, improvement, and cultivation of the premises sold for a period of not less than five years, during which time the purchaser or grantee shall not alienate such lands or the title thereto.

That is the law now?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes, sir.

Mr. OLMSTED. My amendment is that any American citizen may purchase, subject to the conditions and restrictions of this act.

Mr. QUEZON. Yes, sir; I understand that.

Mr. OLMSTED. Therefore he would have to live on the land he purchased for five years continuously and improve it, and he could not sell it or mortgage it for five years. Now, does the gentleman from the Philippines object to the purchase of 40 acres of land by a citizen of the United States to live upon continuously for five years under the conditions of that act.

Mr. QUEZON. I have already stated, Mr. Speaker, that I have no objection to that proposition, but I also say that it will not work as the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires. No citizen of the United States will ever want 40 acres of land in the Philippines under those conditions, and the gentleman is wise enough to realize that I am right in my assertion. If all that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is seeking for is what he has just stated, he may just as well withdraw his amendment, for I can assure the gentleman that it will be of no use. If the gentleman is trying to press his amendment because of the question of principle therein involved, then it would be a different matter. To what I have already said on that point I shall have something more to add later on.

The trouble, Mr. Speaker, comes, or rather will come if the amendment is adopted, from those words recited by the gentleman, "subject to the conditions and restrictions of this act," which words have become very famous during the last year or two, thanks to the various interpretations given to them by very distinguished lawyers.

As history repeats itself, it is more than probable that, some time after this amendment has been adopted, an unusually brilliant legal mind will give birth to a lucid and wonderful construction of that language, and to the astonishment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, author of the amendment, who now knows what he means by it, we will learn that his amendment has authorized the Philippine Government to dispose of Philippine public lands in such manner that somebody from Wall Street will be owning thousands and thousands of acres of public lands in the Philippine Islands by virtue of said amendment. I know that the gentleman will think that my fears are rather fantastic, but it is well to profit from the experience of others, and the experience of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], as well as of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], is fresh enough in our memory to be overlooked. We know that both of these gentlemen understood at the time of the framing of the organic act that the words "subject to the limitations and condition provided for in this act," used in section 65 thereof, meant that the friar lands could not be sold in excess of 40 acres to individuals and 2,500 acres to corporations; but they are now puzzled to hear that such language means nothing of the sort.
